Although there are two completely separate people , these perfect teens share a body and have only two arms and legs between them. Born in 1990, the girls were raised in a small, tightly knit community in Minnesota, almost entirely protected from prying eyes and inquisitive glances. For their friends and family, they are different people with very different personalities, needs, tastes and desires. But for the outside world they are a medical mystery - especially considering the fact that they can do virtually all the same things as their friends, including playing the piano, cycling, swimming and playing softball their personalities make them inspirational, says their mother Patty. They never give up; Whatever they want to do, they go out and do it. The medical world is trying to figure out how two separate brains and the nervous system can function in such a perfectly coordinated way, but the twins and their family have always resisted irrelevant medical tests. The family wants to treat them like everyone else, says Joy Westerdahl, a girl doctor who admits it's a mystery how their unique physiology works. As they enter adulthood, the twins are likely to leave the refuge of their hometown and face the wider world. In preparation for this time, they took part in this intimate documentary to show the world what it's like to be connected for life. Life.
