It is the name that is given to materials that are derived by culling a tie, which is called a monomer, which is formed with carbon (C) hydrogen (H), oxygen (O), nitrogen (N) and other organic or inorganic elements, in groups of molecules that are in a simple form and by converting it into a long and chained form called polymer. As the definition suggests, plastics are not found ready in nature. They are obtained as a result of human intervention to the elements in nature. Conduct occurs at a certain temperature and pressure with the help of a catalyst and by injecting monomers into the reaction. When the plastic is obtained at first, it can be in dust, resin or granular form. Typically, plastics are derived from material that remains the result of crude oil processing that is used in refineries. According to studies, only 4% of the world's oil is used in the production of plastic. Plastic dies out after about 1,000 years.
