Many of us do almost everything we can to avoid uncomfortable conversations. Maybe someone isn't doing their job, they missed a bunch of deadlines, or they've been caught being dishonest regardless of the situation, even those of us who don't consider ourselves non-confrontation can be afraid of unpleasant conversations. But the longer you avoid them, the longer the issue will be pliered. Instead of procrastinating, try this approach for difficult conversations that not only don't go off the rails, but actually lead to the changes you're looking for. Determine the ideal outcomeThe time, we enter into complex confrontations, thinking about the motivating issue, not about its solution. So before you even approach the person, you need to talk, consider what you want to achieve. Is it better performance, more accountability, changing attitudes? Visualize the perfect result and then work your way back from there. What should be done to move the conversation in this direction? This may seem obvious, but the stress of tough conversations can sometimes cause this principle to be easy to forget. We all have preconceived notions about people and why they act the way they do. This can put a productive conversation in the way.2 Check your emotionsMake sure that the conversation is not about venting your own frustrations. If you need to practice, talk to someone you trust as a family member, colleague, or friend. Make them push away from you and get defensive. Make sure you are not driven by anger by any resistance you may encounter during the real thing.3 Stick to factsOnce you have your emotions under control, do your homework. Pin down as objectively as you possibly can what actually happened, which led to the problem at hand and the consequences that followed. For example, because a team member or colleague missed a certain deadline, the order was lost and the company risked losing the customer. Don't focus on how it makes you feel, and don't make any judgments about why the person you're facing may have dropped the ball. Leave this part for them to tell you. Submit only the facts and make sure you get them right. Listen To Activell's probably the hardest step. We all have preconceived notions about people and why they act the way they do. This can put a productive conversation in the way. So pretend that you will be checked after your chat about how well you can repeat what they say. Fight the urge to jump and contradict them, even if they get the fact wrong. You will have the opportunity to correct the misconceptions, but you have to listen first. Pay close attention not only to the words, but also to the tone of the voice and body language5. what you've heard and ask for clarification In order to make any real progress, the person you're talking to should feel That doesn't mean they should feel that you agree with their point of view, just that you fully understand what it's made up of. You can say: What I heard, you say, that_____. Is that correct? 6. Request a solution, based on the ideal result you have identified from the beginning, ask your listener to make changes that you believe will prevent the subject from continuing-not to require them. Then ask what they think needs to change to find a solution. Make sure you are not driven by the wrath of any resistance you may encounter There is no guarantee that the other person will be open, non-defensive, and willing to adapt. But if your conversation has gone well up to this point, the chances are that you'll be able to has a hash out of a good resolution much more.7 Get Down To Brass Tacks-TogetherAs you trade ideas about solutions, it's important not only to consider the problem you're dealing with right now, but also future scenarios that may arise. Try to come up with the means to resolve such disputes, which you both agree. And go beyond common relationships to find specific actions and behavioral changes to implement. Emphasize the sincere comments of the other party or the actions they have committed and let them know that you value them for their cooperation. If the conversation starts to break down, or if any of you get upset, take a break and start all over again later. Trying to push on after the emotions boiled will only make the situation worse. Of course, there is never a guarantee that you will get the result you are looking for. It starts by acknowledging that you can't control someone else's thinking and shouldn't try. But if you can follow these steps, you will be able to walk away from the process, regardless of the outcome, knowing that you gave it the best shot you could. Not long ago, Comstock, 46, was a marketing manager at General Electric; we have to thank her for the ecomagination. This space is frantic and chaotic, and we are constantly trying to get out of our own way. With success, you will get a little more confident. But we still need to be more focused and more disciplined. Are you still, as you once said about yourself, impatient? Yes. And I'm afraid. I scan the landscape all the time. What happens next? Who's going to get there first? This business is so hypersensitive. You have to choose the path, keep it, and feel good about it. The second guess ends up with more than an ulcer.
