Picture: imagedepotpro/E/Getty Images We can all look back on our time in primary school and remember how we learned about the Industrial Revolution. We were educated on the push for innovation and fresh inventions, the emergence and huge growth of factories, and the living and working conditions people faced during this time. From its birth in the United Kingdom to its arrival in the United States, this transformative time in history has not only influenced technology, but forever changed the world in many ways. So, how much do you honestly remember from your school days? Can you remember the actual decade of the Industrial Revolution began? Can you describe the conditions that lead to the unions we still see in use today? What about naming not only the most important inventions of the time, but also those responsible for their creation? If you're looking to freshen up on a piece of history you may have forgotten a little about or you want to show off your steel memory trap, it's time to test your knowledge of what happened in the era of landscape expansion, incredible innovation and the ultimate shift in life as people knew it. Let's see what you have! Before the steam power and steam engine, most plants were powered by wind, water or even a horse or human. Before its creation, the plants also had to be located along water sources and could not go beyond that. With the locomotive, factories and their machines became more efficient, and people could travel on a locomotive, vehicle and car.
