My first introduction to the paraffin wax bath was at the spa, where I marveled at how relaxing wax treatment for my hands actually was. Not only do my hands and fingers feel smooth, soft and very hydrated, after waxing, they immediately looked ten years younger - a complete breakthrough for those struggling with cracked skin, especially on their knuckles. What I don't understand until doing much more research is that a paraffin wax bath can have powerful therapeutic effects for those to rehabilitate after serious injuries to their arms and legs. In addition, these paraffin wax machines make great gifts for the elderly, so you may want to consider one for aging parents or grandparents, or anyone else who suffers from osteoarthritis on a long-term basis. In the case of dry, cracked skin, the paraffin wax bath helps soothe and soften even the roughest hands and feet, with a combination of moist heat and paraffin that helps deliver moisture from your body to the surface of your skin, naturally rehydrating dry tissues. The biggest advantage of these treatments is that warm wax can completely cover every square inch of the arm or leg, providing healing power in such a way that the heat pack, combined with lotion, simply cannot. The trick is to dip the dry appendage five or six times, waiting long between dips to make the wax begin to set. Once well covered with molten paraffin, you quickly slip your hand into a plastic sleeve and then slide onto a thermal mitt or wrap it in a warm towel to deliver better results. In 15 minutes be amazed by this difference, and with regular treatments, real relief is at hand. If you want to know what physiotherapists really think, check out this video from two guys who claim to be the most famous PTs on the internet. Well, maybe. At least if you haven't used wax bath paraffin, you'll get an idea of how this therapy works. you want to be sure to use paraffin wax that is actually designed for this purpose. Different waxes can have different melting points, and those that require more heat are more likely to burn you. You can also add essential oils to make your paraffin wax bath aromatherapy treatment too. While you can use a slow cooker or a regular pan to melt the wax, we strongly recommend the paraffin wax machines, like the ones on this list, to perform the process. Why? Because these devices are specifically designed for this use, so you'll have less worries about overheating the wax, and get burned as a result. And don't confuse them with the kind of wax heaters and procedures for removing facial and body hair, because it's a completely different matter. It's not just resorts providing paraffin wax therapy these days. You will find many physiotherapists also use paraffin wax baths to increase circulation and recovery speed after injury. And when it comes to arthritis relief, we have long known that warm water and hot showers can help relieve pain, but their downside is that they also dry out the skin. If you are looking for therapeutic anti-cosmetic treatments (don't discount the discomfort of dry cracked skin), we recommend one of the first five paraffin wax baths on this list. They are more reliable, with larger metal tanks that can hold more molten wax. This makes them suitable for knees, elbows and even large men's legs. They are aimed at professional use, but for the price they are not out of reach for your home. Sure, they'll take a little more counter space, but their deep tanks make it much easier to provide a soothing wax bath for large areas, including forearms and ankles.
