It is also a geographical and political region of Italy and is famous for its various landscapes, cuisine and fascinating history. Because of its strategic location, Sicily was invaded by many armies for centuries and was once a colonial place in Rome, Greece and Phoenicians. For history lovers and interested tourists, the remnants of their culture remain to this day. The quality of the road and the riding road is different. Some people are as good as major autostradas (highways), but small rural roads can be pitiful, especially after heavy rains where axle-breaking potholes appear and landslides lead to road closures. Sicily has a limited network of highways, Stradestatarì (state roads and Strade regions - local roads), but sometimes only country lanes, but provides more beautiful views and access to small towns and villages. Climate and environment, when to goDue to the sunny weather, coastal temperatures rarely below 15 degrees Celsius. The best time to visit Sicily is April - June and September - October, the weather is usually good, prices are low and tourists are less. Late July and August are the peak of the high season: sun burns, prices swell, and the island's top attractions are flooded with holiday makers. Most of Italy go on holiday during this period (known as Ferragost, literally 'August holiday'), a significant chunk of the population chooses Sicily as its preferred destination. Every village, town or city has a noisy, sensation-exploding food market. Traditional recipes are wonderfully preserved and the restaurant flirts with modern cuisine. Sicilian attitude towards food is very similar to its character - a lot of tradition with just a modern look. Sicily checks all the boxes suitable for visitors, including history, architecture, culture, food, beaches and volcanoes. Still this island has a lot more. Its special charm is in those who continue to burn their culture with loyalty to tradition.
