Runner-up: Andromeda Daphne Maya Rea while you may hear some of the same boys' names on the playground now that I heard when I was a kid (hi, Michael and Ryan!) The odds are that you won't find any girls sporting names that were popular when you were a kid, for example, I never met one young Jennifer, Lisa or Heather. It turns out that girls' names tend to fall out of favor much more quickly - according to findmypast.com, the genealogy website, they turn out to be popular at least seven times more than boys' names. I don't think it's a matter of lack of creativity on the part of the parents of the boys. Here are my theories about why this happened: 1. There are more options available for girls. There seem to be much fewer names out there for boys - as I discovered when I was looking for my son's possible names. Especially if you take out all those - Edèn, and -aiden and - Ayden baby names (which I did). 2. Girls have taken on too many names. Some names that were once only for boys, such as Casey, Riley, Dana and Kennedy, became more associated with girls than boys, meaning that there may be greater limits to what is available to boys. 3. I think girls' parents feel more free to be creative with their children's names. I think parents are more concerned about giving boys a name that stands out (in case it may create problems with bullies on the playground), while girls are less likely You have problems with names that are unique. 4. You can't discount the beginner factor. While women may be less inclined to give their daughters the same names they have, there are always a lot of young (and beyond) around, meaning that they get names passed across generations.
