Laa (no) in the Middle East, Yes and No can be confusing for Americans. In many Arab countries, the gesture for yes - shaking the side top - resembles the American gesture for names in these areas indicate by throwing the head back and looking up. You can be further confused if the Arab recognizes you as an American and tries to use the American gesture. Rest assured, in any Arab country, Laa means no. References to people once you've mastered their common plea, the most important thing to learn is how to refer to people. When meeting people in Arab speaking countries, make sure you use the appropriate formal title. A man should be referred to as-ignice, which is the same as Mr. Y. An elderly or married woman is called Kom-diyida, and is called a young lady called al-aanisa. The next most common way to refer to people is using pronouns. In Arabic, the pronouns (you and them) are complicated by gender and forelift. You'll use a slightly different variation of the words depending on the person you're referring to it's and how well you know them. ana (i) huwa (read) hiya (it) naHnu(n) anta/anti (w[M/F]) antom (w[plurie]) hum(s) sentence for traveling There are some sentences particularly useful in international travelers.
