Previous Conventions Have you ever wondered about the SPSP Convention Committee and the SPSP Board selects the location for each conference? Below we describe the selection process in an effort to improve transparency around the convention. We also describe the process of evaluating scientific programming and determining registration costs as part of these transparency efforts here and here). Selecting a location is a multi-step decision-making process that originated at the SPSP Board meeting each year. The entire council (e.g. the president, the president-elect, the treasurer, etc.) and all the SPSP committee chairs have a long discussion about location. They take into account many factors, described below, and vote in the top locations. If necessary, SPPs then further investigate to obtain the information needed to choose between the locations that received the most votes. The Convention Committee shall then take the decision on where the conference will take place. In making a decision, we consider a million different factors! The size of our conference limits our options quite a bit right off the bat. We are big enough that many cities can't accommodate us, but we are also too small for some of the very large places. Of the options that can accommodate our size, the cost is also a very important factor because ingredient of whether people can participate. We need to consider both the cost of the conference itself (e.g. space reservation) and the cost of people traveling there. Unfortunately, sometimes those that don't fit, and a place that would be cheap to book would be expensive to fly to or vice versa. This also means that we don't just want to have the conference in one location (e.g. San Diego), because that means that traveling is more expensive for people on the East Coast than the West Coast. So we're trying to move from west to center to east coast for that reason. Another important factor in location selection are the laws in each state. For example, some states have anti-LGBTQ laws in place that would directly affect LGBTQ members in attendance (e.g., bathroom bills), and we won't have a conference in a location that is unfriendly to attendees. We also consider (in no special order): weather, accessibility of international members, marketability, and any special opportunities that may exist in a city. Needless to say, once we've taken all these considerations in place, we're left with relatively few potential options. This is a complex process, and a lot goes into the decision for every year.
