Latest articles Companies that produce or manufacture products or goods for sale rarely create the product from scratch. Instead, they must purchase raw materials and component parts from another provider. Some companies specialize in raw materials such as iron, minerals or rubber; others create component parts such as pipes, electronic parts or pastry icing. Internet-based e-commerce partners Many companies rely on web-based software, application and digital scheduling services to do business. B2B companies that fall into this category include website and email host computers, online payment portals, domain or fleet management software, and others. Business supply companies Such companies provide goods or materials, but not for your company's final product. For example, if your company sells T-shirts, you'll probably also need ink pens and notebooks to save business information. Office supplies are not part of your end product, but they are still necessary to run your business. Other examples include companies that provide vending machine stock and toiletries. General business servicesSome B2B companies do behind-the-scenes work that can save you time and help your business run smoothly. For example, cleaning services, marketing or other consulting firms, food companies, and corporate lawyers provide business services to other companies.
