If you've ever moved paper clips around with a magnet or killed the arranging time of metal shavings in a beard on a woolly willy toy, you've dabbled in the basic principles behind even the most complex power generators. The magnetic field responsible for lining all those small pieces of metal in a proper mohawk haircut is due to the movement of electrons. Move a magnet towards a paper clip and you will force the electrons to move in the clip. Similarly, if you allow electrons to move through a metal wire, a magnetic field will be formed around the wire. Thanks to Woolly Willie, we can see that there is a certain link between the events of electricity and magnetism. A generator is simply a tool that transfers a magnet near a wire to create a continuous flow of electrons. The action that forces this movement varies greatly, ranging from hand crank and steam engines to nuclear fission, but the theory remains the same. Advertising is a simple way to imagine a generator acting like a pump pushing water through a pipe to think about it. Instead of just pushing the water, a generator uses magnets to push electrons along. It's a slight oversimplification, but it paints a useful picture of properties at work in a generator. A water pump moves a certain number of water molecules and applies a certain amount of pressure on them. Similarly, the magnet in a generator pushes a certain number of electrons and applies a certain amount of pressure to the electrons. In an electrical circuit, the number of electrons in motion is called amperage or current, and is measured in amps. The pressure pushing electrons together is called voltage and is measured in volts. For example, a generator spinning at 1,000 rotations per minute can produce 1 amp at 6 volts. 1 amp is the number of electrons moving (1 amp physically means that 6.24 x 10¹⁸ electrons go through one wire every second), and the voltage is the amount of pressure behind those electrons. Generators make the heart of a modern powerhouse. In the next section, we'll take a look at how one of these stations works. But Nichols, who studied interior design at UCLA, is a practitioner of a different kind of Earth-friendly style: glamorous, modern, sophisticated. The Palm Springs-based designer, who trumps that notion in the dining room shown here, has a crunchy, Birkenstock-y-like image that comes with the idea of a green interior. Built in Contempo Homes, a model for a developer in the desert town, it blends a work from sleek artist Gabriel Rivera and the ambient collection with dining tables and chairs Terrazzo floor and a chandelier from artemide with a dim fluorescent bulb fitted. If you do your homework, you can find finishes and fixtures with a high level of refinement, like the clothes of the dining chair, which looks like a rich suede but recycles polyester, says Nicholls. Nicholls designs with a rigorous thoughtfulness. Everything should be an objective, he says, with its two-year-old firm, which promises to pave the way for a new kind of eco-decorating to the forefront typing sensible approach of environmentally aware pragmatism places and helping — with a Birkenstock in sight. - Mario López-Cordero Photo: Courtesy of Scott Van Contempo Holmes Photo: David Walter Gilbert REDTOP Architects Redheads, he says, are incandescent. Well, so is Redtop, a young New York firm whose architecture produced by principals — (from left) Amy Shakespeare, 36; Virginia Kindred, 41; And Lauren Rubin, 37 - has all the Auburn hair. The three met while working at New York's Mitchell/Giurgola Architects and banded together in 2003 to share their shared philosophy that has the power to please people for architectural design, and also on a budget. We believe that light and color and texture can make a simple office a very wonderful place, Rubin says. In the recent Manhattan townhouse project for a family of six, they restored the historic front and invented the rest. Major steps: A two-storey rear extension, with a Mondrian-like glass and steel wall, looked back from the outfit with a lux gas grill by a new wolf. Architects also designed overscale lighting fixtures that dramatically illuminate indoor living space. Because the redtop is committed to green building, the townhouse has a geothermal well, which uses earth's own temperature to generate warmth and coolness through bright floors. The group uses the term 'fun' as one of the highest goals of architecture. The townhouse roof, occupied by heavy cooling equipment now in space, now features in a basketball court. - Cara Greenberg Photo: Frances Dzikowski Photo: Arlene Byster, Byster Studios Matt LORENZ The Chicago-based 32-year-old who won Bravo's top design believes any designer can pull together a beautiful setting. But we have a responsibility not only to make a room beautiful, but to help our customers' lives function better, Lorenz says. Rather than overdecorate just because of what to expect, we should think about altering mood-picking colors and objects that revive them when they come home at the end of the day. For example, this sunroom was built for a working mother with a busy photography career. Accessed through an archway from the kitchen (the tile floor unites two), it has a wall of windows on the right. It serve as an extension of both outdoors and a relaxation room, another meditation space In the mean, explains Common approach would involve two sofas (or a couch and two chairs) facing each other across a coffee table. Lorenz backfired this conference, deploying a brilliant double-wide debed by Michael Berman and instead two stone-top-and-table. A whitewashed, hand-carved Italian-style table adds a note of the unexpected classical surprise set against Henry Calvin Linen's gromet-hung curtains. Bus. No plasma TV, no game table, no waste, no clutter. People clamor more in a room, clearly not enamored of the idea, says disciplined Lorenz. — George S. I think I've been in the world of design for decades, he says. As a child, I pulled my red wagon around the neighborhood and brought home my treasures to adorn my room again. Graduating from the red wagon to a pickup truck and job in construction, Quiñones learned the nuts and bolts of home improvement and then went on to study design at El Centro College in Dallas. Their resulting style is equal parts sage advice and fresh approach. For a virgin pad for a recent divorce in a Dallas high-rise, that means lining the bedroom in soothing colors and comfortable textures. I wanted it to be a sexy retreat for him, he explains. Quiñones barrel back side chair and bed designed itself. Multipurpose Chaise is a vintage piece that they've got in 1stDibs.com. The bed is the focal point of the room, designed with a mirror behind a mirror to act as a window reflecting light.
