The condos for sale in Arlington Oaks are certainly worthy of everything in themselves, but the story behind them adds to the flavor. The tip of the iceberg is the modern complex - seven elongated two-column structures, built in the style of colonial revival and intertwined with grassy courtyards. The area, which is located just north of Arlington Boulevard and south of Wilson, was once part of a massive colonial-era estate. In the 1930s, however, a New York industrialist named Ellie Freed embarked on a Buckingham experiment to provide better housing for middle-class tenants. The long-term plan included eventually converting rental units into condos for sale-it's at a time when the villas weren't on anyone's radar. The first units were put on great fanfare in 1937. By the early 1940s, the development represented a city of 8,000 residents, with 183 brick garden-style apartment buildings housing 1,817 individual units. At the time, Buckingham was the largest garden apartment community in the whole country! The neighborhood of President's Day is now part of the historic and is commonly referred to as Buckingham Village, with its original center on the corner of N. Glebe and N. Pershing. Arlington Oaks Villas, which are three blocks from downtown, underwent a major overhaul in 1992. You will find many other brick buildings in the area from the experimental city of Frida, many of which are similar condo communities. What can buyers expect to get to the Arlington Oaks? Like many other converted garden apartments, these units offer a range of floor plans, including a one-bedroom, two-bedroom, two-bedroom, three-bedroom townhouse, and two-story, three-bedroom townhouses. Residents have a bike station on the corner and can walk to restaurants and the Ballston metro. Plus, one of the yards has recently been turned into a dog park!
