To do this, your blog has to center around a bunch instead of a few categories. If you write about a few categories, it tells search engines that you may be good at a lot of niches, but they're not necessarily masters. Search engines in the business are getting users to get the right answers quickly, so you usually only find those experts on the front page. It is important to understand the difference between a category and a niche. One category is something like lifestyle, food, and money blogging. Inside each category you can get very specific. For example, if you're a lifestyle blogger you might write about niches like travel, fashion, and DIY all in one blog. Similarly, a money blogger might write about paying off debt, saving money, and budgeting. A money blogger may even have made money about her small business website trip to build her first million dollars Focus on finding a niche market Just something you're an expert on, but something you actually enjoy writing about. Your blog feels less like work when you can spend days researching and writing on your favorite topics. Understand that it's good to change your focus from one niche to the next, but it's best to stick with the same category or related. The reason for this is because you've spent a lot of time telling Google what your blog is about, and if you start saying it you have something else it's possible that you'll get as much search engine traffic. Once you have chosen your niche or blog category, be as specific in naming them as possible. For your blog category, you can choose Cupcakes instead. If your site is very niche and the whole blog is about cupcake, you can specify with cupcake type such as a vegan cupcake, gluten-free cake, lemon cupcake, and red velvet cake. Divaz Dating writes about everything marriage and strengthening family ties. They also join everything from a site and sell dates in a printable type box. 3. Paid themes are found on websites such as Theme Forest or Etsy. If you see a theme you really like from another blog, a handy tool to determine which WordPress theme they're using is what WordPress theme is. You will get instructions on how to install your theme to WordPress no matter where your blog is hosting. An example of the $59 travel blog theme in the Etsy Forest Market theme for creatives, Etsy themes and templates tends to focus heavily on design aesthetics.
