In many parts of the country, operating a tree service is a great way to make a living while helping people maintain their courses. Before you can spend your days outdoors, chainsaw in hand, you need to think about becoming bound. A surety, according to the Surety and Fidelity Association of America, is a kind of insurance that you can buy that guarantees your client financial compensation if you fail to be up to the measure of your agreement. Contact a bonding agency in your area. Please note that some bonds may be provided by the United States Small Business Association. These types of bonds offer smaller or minority entrepreneurs the opportunity to build themselves from scratch. Fill out the necessary link forms. Your bond provider will need to know a lot of information in order to set a rate and assess the risk you are proposing. Bryant Surety Bonds, for example, asks business owners to submit a financial statement for anyone who owns more than 5 percent of the tree company in question. Submit credit information to your bond provider. The company needs to know what's on your credit report, as these numbers provide an indication of your financial stability. A company with shaky finances, for example, may be much more likely to leave projects unfinished. Decide what types of bonds you want to buy. The Bail Information Office points out that a few are available. An offer guarantee guarantees the details of the original contract between your tree service and the owner. A yield bond entitles the owner to money if you are unable to cut down the trees in question. A payment deposit ensures you pay all subcontractors who may be involved in the project. Pay the premium requested upon approval. As JW Surety Bonds notes, the bonding process is quite simple, and this part is pretty clear. Sign the bond and return it to the bond company. This bond is a legal contract with serious obligations to your tree service. (You also receive benefits, of course.) Keep a copy of your files and be prepared to provide it to customers on request. After all, the prospect of removing trees or tree branches can be challenging for homeowners. It is reassuring to be able to prove to the owner that your business is backed and that it will receive the service it has requested. One thing you need to remember about a tree services company is the seasonality of the work. Early spring and late fall are the time of pruning and thinning of trees. Work on trees damaged by high winds is likely to be in winter. Continued... Tree branches are not a project in the rushing point. Even the most ardent doer will probably want to rely on the expertise of tree services on this one. The problem is, how do you find the tree services? Also, once you've located them, how do you separate wheat from tares for such risky work as tree branches (or tree removal)? An all-purpose handyman driving around a neighborhood in a pickup truck with a chainsaw and screaming out of sales pitches may not be suitable for work requiring such a high level of responsibility. For hazardous work such as this, the possession demonstrated by tree services of adequate insurance may well be the consumer's primary consideration. Ask to see workers' liability certificates and compensation insurance, and make sure they are up to date. Call the insurance company to check current policy information. Be wary of hiring tree services asking for payment in advance or who want to start work without having established a free estimate of the cost. In fact, consumers should demand not only an estimate, but also a written contract, specifying precisely what tree connection work entails and for how much. If work is to be done on a tree whose preservation and appearance is important to you, always insist that tree services climb the tree with ropes or climb with an overhead lift (see photo) rather than using climbing tips. The tips cause damage to the cambium of a tree. You should also not let someone talk to you in the head of a tree that matters to you. Determine the extent to which prepared tree services should take appropriate action in the event of misadventure. For example, tree services that remove limbs directly above telephone wires leading to your home should have experience in splicing damaged wires. To minimize the likelihood of such damage in the first place, qualified and experienced professionals will carefully control the fall of limbs using ropes. With electrical wires, the risk is increased to another level: According to arborist Peter Rennie, while most large tree companies have someone who can repair telephone wires wired if they need to be cut, no company reseals your electrical utility cable. This is a direct flow from the utility company, and they have to come and stop the cable to the transformer. This may involve taking power from your neighbors as well. In addition, electrical service cables usually wrap the wire rope around the cables, so if they break, often there is damage to the mast head (where the cable attaches to the house), so an electrician has to repair this as well. Deciding in advance how much you want the tree service you hire to do. Will they just ey the tree, or will they remove the whole tree? If the latter, will they grind the stump, or will you remove the stump from the tree yourself? If you do landscaping on a budget, some of these decisions can be reduced to money. Although prices vary depending on where you live, you can usually expect to pay more than $1,500 to have a large tree completely removed from your property. The cost of a typical member operation can be closer to $500. Finally, it never hurts to do some questions around yourself. Enjoy word of mouth by entering conversations on the subject with neighbors. If someone else in the neighborhood once had a member of the tree arrive unexpectedly on the living room carpet, accompanied by a glass shower, due to the incompetence of a tree service, chances are you'll hear about it. Conversely, tree services that are worth hiring will benefit from word of mouth and will be happy to provide a list of phone numbers from local customers satisfied with a job well done. Like when dealing with any professional who will work around your home, don't be afraid to ask for tree service referrals. Services.
