The Vermont Country Store For the last year I have been trying unsuccessfully to visit the flagship of the Vermont Country Store, in Weston, Vt. Initially I launched my repeated failure to logistics; There was simply never a good time to break with city for a weekend. The company's folkloric catalog has been a staple of my mailbox for possibly my entire life, though it took a middle-class job in Times Square, filled with subway commuting and high heels, for me to truly appreciate its accounting appeal. Flipping through its crumbling, matte pages, so unlike its glossy retail cousins, has the mild effect of giving a playful Lanz flannel kittens dress for mothers and daughters alike ($34.95 to $59.95, child sizes at 3X) and risking a Santa Winking Cup ($19.95 for a set of two) of hot ovaltin ($9.95). I am transported to the lace curtains and checkered sofa cushions of my childhood in New England, not excluding junk drawer cooking, where every last thingamabob, no way witty it may be, invariably fulfilled its fate. (A poor relationship with the box labeled String Too Short to Be Saved that poet Donald Hall found in his grandparents' attic in New Hampshire and subsequently titled a book afterwards.) Here, in this era of forceful heritage brands such as Hendrick's Gin (b. 1999) and Madewell (b. 1937, d. 1989, resurrected 2006), these self-leased Purveyors of practice and hard to find proper authenticity like few others. In 1897, Gardner Lyman Orton, a 12th-generation American, opened a general store in Calais, Vt., the same year his son, Vrest, was born. In 1945, after serving in World War II, graduating from Harvard, working in New York publishing and writing speeches for the Pentagon, Vrest Orton returned to Vermont, where he and his wife, Ellen, also natives, set up a printing press in their garage and entered the mail ordering business. Its inaugural catalogue, 24 pages of 36 durable and practical products, came out to people on its Christmas card list. The following year the Ortons bought an 1827 building (formerly a rural inn) on Main Street in Weston; Today the whole village (pop. 566) is on the National Register of Historic Places. In 1967 they opened a second store in Rockingham, Vt., about an hour southeast. Orton died in 1986; Mrs Orton in 2010. Today the company is owned and run by his son Lyman and his sons Cabot, Gardner and Eliot - who, if I'm not mistaken, occasionally comes 6 as a model. At least I think it's Eliot in a pair of Hunter Green Men's Jersey Knit 100% Cotton Ski Pyjamas ($34.95). The catalogue has 100-odd pages of 1,000-odd products, a Yankee consumerism museum holding from personal remedy potions with names like Old Goat and Vim & Vigor up to non-slip ice nails for boots or sneakers per flannel in the way you like. Who doesn't need adjustable nail polish support – helps you paint your nails easily ($9.95)? Who doesn't want to make their way through a can of Boston's beloved Necco Wafers ($11.95), a sack of The Creams of From Baltimore's Goetze ($14.95), a box of freshly made Vermont cider doughnuts ($21.95 for 12)? The Vermont Country StoreThe manufacturing equipment has risen more some missing items, now sold as exclusive to the Vermont Country Store. Tangee Lipstick ($14.95), which changes color to complement its skin tone, was gracing pouts in 1928, went out of production in the 1960s, and returned from the dead in 2002. Starting in the 1960s: the original mood-changing lipstick is back to your request ($19.95 for a set of six). Remember Gee, your hair smells like fantastic shampoo ($14.95) ? Now your hair can smell like the 1970s. It's a journey down memory lane so masterfully paved that I don't even care about the memories I remember. I have as much pleasure reading the blessedly simple, jargon-less copy as I do using hand-drawn illustrations to represent, for example, a forearm devastated by psoriasis before and after a Medicated Coal Tar Ointment ($19.95) application. Surely by simply exposing myself to such a thrifty practicality I'm saving money. Last March, for a surfing holiday in Costa Rica, she needed a sturdy swimsuit that could withstand repeated wipes without riding in unsemocious places. I had a lot of grandma's store deals that I would deliver in trendy ways retro cuts just look like. In the spirit of contemporaneity (and panic-induced travel expedition), I went to her website, written in swimsuit, and came across a rockettes line of maximum seat coverage. I chose the shirred front swimsuit ($74.95) with modest girl leg style and added curve appeal in a floral pattern that reminded me of something Elizabeth Taylor may have worn. She would definitely have worn the Cotton Mediterranean Mood Lounger ($39.95), a voluminous cotton chambray caftan with blue details, and so in my online shopping bag both were. Like the Victorian One-Piece PJs snowy cotton lawn ($49.95), a cross between a sleeveless sweater and trousers with pockets (to keep lace hankies close, a touch more Elizabeth Barrett Browning than Elizabeth Taylor) had long banned me from buying, but I could no longer resist. For a penny, for a pound! (All purchases are guaranteed forever.) When the package arrived, there was a label on the swimsuit that said: We know you still have it and we'll help you show it off! It was after this wave I hatched the plan to go north to the source. Ladies' shoes from the 1880s are said to hang from the cracks. I'd dip my hands into wooden barrels filled with penny candies wrapped in foil, sit on hot cider, put my wrists on with Evening in Paris Eau de Parfum ($49.00), touted in the 1950s as the fragrance that more women wear than any other in the world. But after that and the whole leaf season couldn't lure me away from Brooklyn, it became clear that I didn't really want to make the pilgrimage. In her new book The Power of Glamour, Virginia Postrel distills glamour into three essential elements: the escape, grace and mystery. He also explains that one of the reasons he continually reappears in new ways is that the process of projection, longing and persecution is pleasing. He cites sociologist Colin Campbell's theory of a modern, self-illusory hedonism that is less about the feeling of searching for food, drink and sex than is the emotional pleasure derived from anticipation of new experiences. That is, actually visiting the Vermont Country Store, I would ruin your promise to escape. I'd rather stay in town and flip the catalog, dreaming of a quiet, snowy place where time never stops, and wondering if I should get the Mohair-Blend Ear Warmer Wool Bonnet ($15.95) in blue, black or violet. Violet.
