They are thought to be two complete combinations by punctuation marks, usually semi-colons or connections. Remember that independent clauses are complete sentences or thoughts with themes and verbs. In other words, two independent clauses are combined into two complete thoughts. Let's look at an example of a composite sentence. Example: You have a cat and a dog. We can separate complex sentences into two small, complete thoughts. Sentence 1: I have a cat. Sentence 2: I have a dog. Composite sentences use a combination to combine two complete thoughts. A connection is a word used to link sentences. Many connections use commas and coordinators \(and, yes, or not yet, etc.\). In the following compound sentences, coordinators and commas have been underlined to see how two complete sentences were replaced with composite sentences. I'd love to go to a party, but I have so much homework. Your mother is wise, so you should listen to her. You can also use a semicolon to create a composite sentence. Instead of using reconciliation joins, you can put this punctuation mark between two sentences. Example: My sister loves swimming. She is on the swimming team. Two simple sentences can stand on their own, but we connect to the idea of putting a semicolon between them. Semicolons do not use adjustment joins. Instead, semicolons tell the reader that there are two complete ideas, but that idea is closely related to the idea. A semicolon creates a longer pause, unlike a connection. If you read When you connect, you will find that the sentences flow much faster. One reason someone can use a semi-colon is to allow the reader to pause a little more between the overall thoughts. In the following example, you can see that using a semicolon clarifies the second half of a sentence.
