How to pronounce yuanyuan

Recognizable to me: Can you pronounce my Chinese name? I guess it can be difficult, so I have an English name. If you find it too hard to call me by my Chinese name, you can just call me Jessica Chen. This is me in the Garden of the Gods. My boyfriend found a good visual angle that makes me look like I'm eating the stone behind me. I'm a senior student at CU-Boulder. This is my last six months before my graduation. I am a Chinese and speak Mandarin, English, and basic Korean. I've lived in the United States for almost five years. Although everything here is very different from my hometown in China, I recognize Colorado as my second hometown. This is the place where I really grew up as an adult and became independent. I couldn't forget the experiences I've had here. They're my treasures. This summer I'm a little busy. I attended the graduation ceremony in May, and my parents and brother came to celebrate with me. Then they came with me for ten days. You may notice that I haven't graduated. Why did I attend the graduation ceremony? I prefer the summer ceremony rather than the winter ceremony. Then I could wear my beautiful dress and go out with my families without worrying about the weather. Where I'm at: I was born in China and lived there for 19 years. I graduated from a Chinese high school. Then I flew halfway around the world to the United States. I'm having a hard time starting my new life here. But it's getting better and better. This summer I'm in Colorado, mostly in Boulder. I have family members in Littleton, Colorado. Sometimes I visit them there. I have been writing online course this summer, so I plan to spend the whole month studying, and I will be planning my trip after class and before the last semester starts giving myself a rest from the busy and stressful summer. What I want: Since I have only one semester left before graduation, I think the business writing class is important and difficult for me (my native language is Chinese, so I'm not sure about my English writing). I chose to participate in the summer class and I was able to give myself more time to focus on it, and I hope I won't be so stressed out with getting a good score and really learning something that is useful for my future career. I still remember when I took the first year writing class three years ago. I struggled a lot with the course. I went to business hours all the time and keep revising my essay with my professor. The salary is proportional to the reward. With my enthusiastic classmates and helpful professor, I got a really good point, eventually. Where I can find: This summer you can find me in Boulder. But probably most of the time online, you can try using the famous Chinese chat app called WeChat to find me, the app's language can be changed to English. Next semester, all my classes will be taught in the KOBL building. I that you will have a good chance chance see me there. Since it will be my last semester, I will not have a busy schedule for my classes. I think I will be busy finding my job and plan to find a new part-time job during the semester. So I can currently be busy in different places, either on campus or off campus, but believe me, I will always be online to receive messages from you if you want to contact me. The International Monetary Fund announced that it will add the Chinese renminbi-or yuan-to its selective basket of reserve currencies. The Nov 30 decision promises to be a boon to China's efforts to play a greater role in the global economy. And to punny headline writers. The thing is, yuan puns in the English-language media—like Yuan-way bet or Yuan for money—are not only terrible, they're based on a mispronunciation of yuan that sounds positively ugly to Mandarin speakers. Most yuan mis-puns rely on a pronunciation that sounds like you-on or possibly wan. These are then replaced by the English word one. The Economist at one point worried that its own punning of the yuan on one had gone too far (paywall). Quartz has been guilty of this too (yuan more time.) But you-on/wan isn't the only error pronunciation out there. The author of Yuan some, some lose seem to think it's you-in. In yuan and the restless it seems to be more like the Dutch name Jan. Whoever wrote China has a yuan for luxury, but not at home? may have their Chinese and Japanese currency mixed up. And does so mean you still yuan out won out or want out or win? If you want to know how to say it right, don't trust YouTube — many videos that promise to teach it are in fact inaccurate. The correct pronunciation is something like you-a. But that's just to get started. The first you part is pronounced with the mouth forward, like the German letter ü. The second part is really somewhere between en and an. (You can think of it as -one in broken or -an in Conan.) Here is a Chinese teacher pronouncing yuan, as well as some other basic Mandarin sounds. Another odd thing about the yuan in English is that, in Mandarin, the word is not really used to refer to the currency. Renminbi is normally reserved for this purpose, as in this Caixin story (link in Chinese) at the IMF announcement. Renminbi is akin to the dollar, while the yuan is more like a few dollars. In writing, the yuan is used to say how much something costs (500 million yuan is spent on infrastructure projects). A third word, kuaì, is the most common in numbers (it's 20 bucks). This is the case in Taiwan as well, so it is not just about the official policy of the renminbi, which means the people's currency. There is not really any English words that work with proper pronunciation of yuan, but some are closer than others. When is probably better than one. Yuan will the puns stop?
