Fox Theatre Pomona Seat Numbers – Loge, Orchestra, Mezzanine and Balcony Seating Theater seating is often arranged in such a way that a lower number of seats are placed closer to the center of the stage, while a higher number of seats are further from the center of the stage. Rows are usually arranged in alphabetical order. Fox Theatre Pomona can be arranged in a similar way. Loge seating, also sometimes referred to as Box Seating, offers a small, separate seating area. The separate areas are large enough to fit a limited number of people for a more private viewing experience. Loge seats are usually placed immediately forward, side, and above stage level. The orchestra section usually holds the most sought after seats, putting the audience on a par with the stage. Center Orchestra section seats are usually the most popular seats in the house. Looking at the side parts of the orchestra, the lower seat numbers show closer proximity to the orchestra's center seats and the center of the stage. Seats located closer to the aisle usually provide a little more legroom. The mezzane section is usually located one level above the center of the orchestra section. Centrally located seats in this section are also highly sought after, especially in the first few rows. The seats in the mezzanine section are still located near the stage and are usually cheaper than in the orchestra section. Balcony sections usually accommodate the cheapest seats in the theatre. Oftentimes, balcony seats are placed closer together and offer less legroom compared to other sections. This section is usually located on a steeper slope, which means that the difference in visibility between low and high lines can be significant.
