SwiftKey uses a combination of artificial intelligence technologies to predict the next word a user wants to write. Its ability to learn users' writing habits and include words outside the standard dictionary has made it a really popular app among android faithful. Giving a behind-the-scenes look at who runs the app, the developers said: Each language model is much more than a dictionary list of words. To be able to offer unmatched precision and predictions for the next word, SwiftKey models understand how words work together. They are built by analyzing huge volumes of language data extracted from the Internet. They further explained the work done to add support from Hindi and Hinglish, Hindi and Hinglish were produced by analyzing and filtering content from sources such as the .in web domain in India. Using natural language processing techniques, SwiftKey can understand the context of what a user writes. Perhaps SwiftKey's greatest strength lies in customization, and developers explain how it works. In addition to language models that allow SwiftKey to intelligently predict the next words and correct what you type, the app continuously learns the user's individual writing style as they write. Users can further customize SwiftKey by syncing it with their Gmail, Facebook, Twitter or blog With the latest update, SwiftKey now includes support for 54 different languages. To mark the launch of these languages and SwiftKey's v3.1 update, both smartphone and tablet versions will be on sale for half price on Google Play. The full v3.1 version notes are as follows: New! Compared to any other mobile operating system, Android provides users with much more features and customization options. Not only customizations, but app availability is also quite high for Android compared to any other mobile operating system. On average, an Android user installs almost 20-40 apps on their Android smartphone. If you have been using Android for a while, then you may know that the operating system is not made with bilingual users. Let's admit that we all already know more than one language. However, when we set a default system language, every app on your phone uses the language of that region. Then, each app we install uses the default region language. Another thing is that apps are usually written in the developer's native language, so even if you decide to change the language in the app through some third-party apps, it will be poorly translated. So to deal with such problems, we'll share an easy method that will help you set different languages for each of your Android apps. Let's check how to set up different languages for each of your Android apps in 2020. Since this is an Xposed module, Android users must have an Xposed frame installed on the device. See how to use a language app to set an app-based language. Step 1. First of all, you need to root your Android device, because the application that we will discuss here only works on Android roots and for which you see our tutorial on Root Any Android. Now that you've rooted your device, download and install the Xposed Installer app. Install Xposed installed on your Device Step 2. The first thing to do is to install the app named App which is searched by the modules section of the Xposed Framework application i.e. the root application. You will now need to activate this installed module or application locale from the options that appear when you check for the installed modules tab in the Xposed application. Install the application locale module step After activating the app, you'll need to restart your device to make this module work on your device. Now open the module and you'll see the list of all the apps that have been installed on your device. List of applications installed on your Step 4 device. Select one of the apps you want to change the language for, and then use the app interface, select the language you want from the options, and press the verification button. Now you'll need to close the app locale and open the application whose language you've set up. Select the Language Now, you'll be able to see the changes to the language in your app, and all menu texts next to any body text in the app can be viewed in your chosen language. Can I set different languages for each app? Yes, the method shared above can be used to set different languages for each of your Android apps. Is there a security risk associated with App Locale? No, there is no known security risk associated with the local application. However, Xposed modules require Android roots, and rooting android invites many security risks. So, this is the method in which you can easily change the language of your desired Android app. I hope you liked the article, be sure to share it with others too.
