I understand no two cats are similar, but how much sleep does a normal cat need? My 5 year old tabby, Roz, snoozes up to 18 hours a day! W.B., Lansing, Michigan Given the possibility, most cats — from small ones like your tabby to big panthers — will curl up in a warm, cozy spot and nap all day. Because these secret creatures hunt mostly at dawn and dusk, they spend the morning and afternoon in an almost trance-like sleeping state, with their eyes open just enough to reveal all possible dangers. This seemingly excessive dozing provides the energy wild cats need to stalk their robbery. Since a well-fed domestic cat like Roz doesn't need to hunt for her dinner, it's quite possible that she might be at some stage of sleep for 18 hours a day. That said, I would expect a 5 year old cat to be more active than you would describe. Can Roz use to be energetic? If so, she could have an anemic, hectic, or weakened disease that would all make her less playful. Only make sure she is not sick, schedule an appointment with her veterinarian to have a physical and a little blood work. If all is well, you and your kitten can difficulty sleeping. One mother of four from Montgomery, Alabama, likes to meet new people, go bowling with friends, and take long walks outside. It's strangers watching and cruel comments that stop him from crossing the doorstep. Jernigan, 35, was born with an unidentified strain of neurofibromatosis, a rare genetic disorder that leaves her skin covered by thousands of thick, painful tumors. Every day is a struggle, she tells people. People think I have AIDS, they refuse to place my orders in restaurants... It makes me feel like: Why am I even born? Neurofibromatosis 1 affects about 100,000 people across the United States, and only a few million in the world, according to Dr. Caleb Yohay, director of NYU Langone's Comprehensive Neurofibromatosis Center. Patients either get the disorder from their parents or random genetic mutations. There is a close link between cancer and neurofibromatosis 1, the most common type of disorder, Yohay tells people. Women in particular face a high risk of developing breast cancer. People suffering from neurofibromatosis 1 also face shorter life expectancy, usually up to 15 years. Jernigan inherited the condition from her mother, who died of cancer when Jernigan was young. When she was 13 years old, she began to notice tumors growing on her knees and legs. The tumors multiplied and became painful when she became pregnant with her first child, Darnell, when she was 20 years old. Pregnancy can potentiate neurofibromatosis as hormone changes cause tumor growth. Unfortunately, it is quite common for women with NF1 to develop new tumors or increase growth rate for those who already exist when they are pregnant, Yohay says. For Jernigan, the number of tumors increased with each pregnancy. It affected me pretty badly because they began to appear in my face, in my neck, in my hands... when at first, before I had my first child, you could only see if I took my shirt off, she says. And, I've noticed some of the moles I had previously gotten bigger. Jernigan's worsening condition has made it difficult to find work. While she attended college and has applied for several jobs, she is often rejected because of her appearance. Managers won't hire me because they think I'm contagious and are going to scare customers away, she says. There is no definitive cure for neurofibromatosis. Patients may have tumors surgically removed, although the tumors may grow back. Others are turning to opioids and painkillers, or alternative therapies such as acupuncture to manage pain. Jernigan has had several tumors removed, only for them to grow back higher. She wants to try the surgery, but can not afford the procedure and fears a painful recovery. And although the tumors are benign, doctors monitor one on her ribcage for the signs of cancer. Debilitating pain has begun to disrupt her daily life and happiness. Semi-frequent migraines keep her in bed for hours, and back cysts have made upright and walking uncomfortable. Living with neurofibromatosis has damaged her dating life, too – she hopes to fall in love and marry, but dates are disgusted when she discovers her skin condition, she says. Misconceptions about neurofibromatosis – that it is contagious, that it is a sexually transmitted disease – often exace sift bullying and make patients feel anxious, depressed and isolated. Kim Bischoff, CEO of the Neurofibromatosis (NF) Network, says. Unfortunately, these feelings are common in the NF community, she tells people. Aside from stress having a chronic health condition, you feel depressed because you are physically different. Bischoff once met a 60-year-old woman with neurofibromatosis who was afraid to walk to her mailbox. People can live completely isolated because of NF's influence, she says. Jernigan's son Darnell, 15, is starting to show signs of neurofibromatosis: café au lait birthmarks, color coffee, give his skin. Jernigan is afraid to test her other children because she fears results, she says. Lately Jernigan has been looking for support from local disability advocacy groups, and began openly sharing her struggles with neurofibromatosis with her friends – they've encouraged her to be sure and leave the house to do things she loves, such as cooking and dancing. These are good days, but Jernigan is struggling to stay positive. A lot of the time I look in the mirror and feel beautiful and good about myself, but there are always days when I go out and think, What is anyone going to say to me today? and I get so angry & I just want to feel normal, she says. Instead, Jernigan focuses on her children. They really do my days, she says. Much like dry food, it can be difficult to determine what kind of wet foods are best for your cat. When you find the right type of food for your cat, you need to find out how much wet food to feed your cat. Spruce / Theresa Chiechi Many veterinarians recommend that cats eat a diet only or mostly moist foods. There are several reasons for this. First, cats are mandatory tongues and are many carbohydrates (if any). Dry food automatically contains much more carbohydrates than moist foods. In many cats, the consumption of dry food leads to obesity. Secondly, most cats are not great water drinkers and tend to keep themselves on the edge of dehydration. Wet foods naturally provide more water in the diet that supports the kidneys, urinary tract, and overall health. First, determine whether you will be feeding your cat a 100 percent wet food diet or including some dry foods. While the gold standard is to feed all the wet food to cats, some cats love dry food and will undereat if they are just given wet food. In addition, dry food is more affordable, so feeding part dry will be easier on your budget. Feeding mixed and dry may require a bit of math to make sure your cat gets an adequate number of calories. One easy starting point is to look at the recommended daily amount of feeding on each type of food and half of them. Once you've settled on a ratio wet to dry, it's time to determine the calorie count of food. Make sure you are feeding a quality diet that is listed as complete and balanced with AAFCO. Then, determine the number of calories per portion. Your calorie needs depend on several factors. The weight of your cat can give you basic guidance on how much to feed. However, it is important to determine the state of your cat's body. A lean, muscular cat with large bones can weigh 15 pounds and be a healthy weight. This cat will require more calories to maintain this healthy weight. However, a 15-pound, small boned, overweight cat has fewer calories. An overweight cat should be fed according to her ideal weight, not her actual weight. Age and activity levels also play a role in determining the correct amount of calories required. A growing kitten needs far more calories than an adult or older cat. An active cat that runs and plays will often need more calories than a cat who is still less liked most of the time. The nursing mother needs extra calories to produce milk and stay healthy. If you want to be accurate in calculating the number of calories you feed your cat, then start by discovering how many calories your cat needs. The National Research Council offers a general guideline on nutritional needs for cats: Requires about 200 calories per day for five pounds of body weight (after return). A 5-pound cat with a lean body type needs about 170 calories a day. A 10-pound cat with a lean body type needs about 280 calories a day. A 15-pound cat with a lean body type needs about 360 calories a day. A 20-pound cat with a lean body type needs about 440 calories a day. An overweight 5-pound cat needs about 180 calories a day. Overweight 10 pounds needs about 240 calories per day. An overweight 15-pound cat needs about 280 calories a day. Overweight 20 pound cat needs about 310 calories calories Day. A 5-pound pregnant or breastfeeding cat needs about 336 calories a day. A 10-pound pregnant woman or breastfeeding cat needs about 603 calories a day. A 15-pound pregnant woman or breastfeeding cat needs about 851 calories a day. A 20-pound pregnant woman or breastfeeding cat needs about 1,091 calories a day. It is acceptable to use the feeding recommendations on the packaging as a starting point for how much to feed. The diet website can go into more detail about feeding guidelines. The amount you feed may need to be adjusted depending on how your cat reacts. If you notice unwanted weight gain or loss, the amount should be adjusted. If your cat seems very hungry and doesn't gain weight, it's acceptable to increase the amount you feed. Many moist foods come in three ounces of kats and recommend feeding about one can a day every three to three and a half pounds of body weight. However, brands are different. A happy, healthy cat will keep a good weight and stay active. Properly fed cat will not act hungry all the time, but also maintain a healthy weight. Remember to visit your vets for annual or 20th annual wellness exams to make sure your cat is as healthy as possible. Possible.
