The book is based on a series of articles written by the authors for The Wall Street Journal. [1] The book was later made in a made-for-TV movie by HBO, also known as Barbarians at the Gate. The book centers on F. Ross Johnson, the CEO of RJR Nabisco, who planned to buy out the rest of the Nabisco shareholders. Summary Those opposed to Johnson's bid for the company, Henry Kravis and his cousin George R. Roberts, were among the pioneers of the leverage spending (LBO). Kravis was the first person Johnson spoke about doing the LBO and felt betrayed after learning that Johnson wanted to do the deal with another firm, American Express's former Shearson Lehman Hutton division. Ted Forstmann and his Forstmann Little buying firm also played a prominent role. After Kravis and Johnson failed to reconcile their differences, a bid war took place that Johnson would eventually lose. The unfortunate side effect of the augmented buyout price to shareholders was the creation of an alarming level of debt for the book comes from a statement by Forstmann, in which he called Kravis's money telephone junk tape and declared him and his cousin as real people with real money, which also declared that raids such as Kravis stop: We must push back the barbarians of the city's gates. The film is directed by Glenn Jordan and written by Larry Gelbart. It stars James Garner as F. Ross Johnson, the CEO of RJR Nabisco, and Jonathan Pryce as Henry Kravis, his chief competister for the company. It also contains Peter Riegert, Joanna Cassidy and Fred Dalton Thompson. The film won both the Primetime Emmy Award for outstanding television movie and the Golden Globe for Best Television Movie, while James Garner won the Golden Globe for Best Actor in a Miniseries of Movie. FOX also broadcast the film later in the same year. Plot Self-made multimillionaire F. Ross Johnson, CEO of RJR Nabisco, decided to take the tobacco and food conglomerate company privately in 1988 after he prioritized news of the likely market failure of the company's smokless cigarette called Premier, developing what was intended to finally increase the company's stock price. [1] The free spending of Johnson's bid for the company is opposed to two of the pioneers of leverage spending, Henry Kravis and his Kravis feels betrayed when, after Johnson initially discussed taking the LBO with Kravis, he takes the potentially enormous agreement to Firm, the Shearson Lehman Hutton division of American Express. Other beaters emerge, including Ted Forstmann and his company, Forstmann Little, after Kravis and Johnson can't reconcile their differences. The bid goes to unprecedented heights, and when executive charles Hugel becomes aware of how much Johnson stands to take advantage of in a deal that will put thousands of Nabisco employees out of work, he asks: Now I know what the 'F' stands for in F. Ross Johnson. The greed is so clear, Kravis's final bid is declared the winner, even though Johnson's was higher. The title of the book and film comes from a statement by Forstmann in which he mentions that Kravis's money phone-junk tape crap and how he and his brother are real people with real money, and that raids like Kravis stop: We need to push the barbarians back from the city gates.
