Access Judici.com free case search pages has been revoked for your IP address due to an apparent breach of our Terms of Use. The Terms of Use allow users to download only non-essential parts of data Judici.com and specifically disables the use of scripts, programs or other automated means to obtain data. These restrictions have been implemented because: The mass distribution of electronic court records is strictly governed by Illinois Supreme Court policy. Among other things, the purpose of this policy is to prevent improper access to data that has been seized, declared private or otherwise restricted after the organisation receives a copy of it. Automatic access to data to achieve mass backdoor distribution creates high traffic on the site, resulting in an unacceptable waiting time for users who comply with the terms of use. So according to our Terms of Use, we have permanently denied access to your IP address Judici.com. If you feel that your use does not conflict with our Terms of Use, you may object to the matter by sending us by email. If your use is person-oriented, focusing on ad hoc queries addressed to specific individuals, rather than getting data for bulk storage and reuse, we may meet your needs with an online service. By providing such narrowly scale web services, we can often avoid the burden of putting on our servers and bandwidth users scraping scripts. If you're interested, send an email describing the searches you want to run and the data elements you're looking for about the cases you've returned. Ago.
