Disney may be one of the largest corporations worldwide, but the Disney Plus service doesn't really bring anything entirely new to the table. Streaming services have been in existence for a while and Disney Plus does exactly what others do: it uses the internet to stream content to your device. But HBO Go and Netflix, for example, are significantly more popular streaming apps that consumers, in general, are pleased with. So why go to the lengths of creating a new streaming service? Well, because you have to, in this day and age. Traditional television is slow, but definitely dying and it's being replaced by streaming – being able to access your desired content anytime you find it convenient. But does Disney do this because it's desperate? Away from it. Disney is one of the top players in the game. It owns Marvel, Marvel Studios, Fox, ESPN, Hulu, you name it! So it's clearly already making money from streaming. To stay on top, every company needs to follow trends to some extent, and Disney has decided to do this and beyond. You see, Netflix is the only thing Netflix owns. The company bought the rights to many other shows, movies, and content, but the only thing Netflix can offer is more Netflix content. On the other side, Disney owns a ton of companies, from GoPro to Hulu. So it can bring a lot of different immense services, but suitable. Currently, Disney Plus, upon release, is rumored to be offering a package that combines ESPN+, Hulu and Disney Plus for about $13 per month. This is something that Netflix, for example, will not be able to match. Compatibility Although Disney is immensely superior to its competitors when it comes to all the potential deals and options it can offer, having a specific quality it lacks, from the user's point of view. While you can get services like HBO Max and Netflix on most devices (smart TVs or streaming), Disney Plus is somewhat limited. Upon release, it will be available on Apple TV, iOS devices, Android TV, Android devices, Roku, Chromecast, Amazon Fire, PlayStation 4 and Xbox One. This may look like a solid list, but it lacks a few elements. Smart TVs If you own Comcast's Xfinity smart TV, for example, you won't be able to find the Disney app in Xfinity's dedicated store. The same thing happens with Spectra, Sony, Vizio and other major smart TV companies. This will likely be a huge deterrent for some interested parties, as required to purchase a new device, supported TV, or streaming device. Sure, Roku is an affordable and supported way to go, but it can easily seem like too much trouble, which will inevitably turn certain users away. That said, there is hope that Xfinity will eventually get Disney Plus. Both Samsung and LG TVs support Disney Plus, which suggests Disney is taking Netflix's approach to spreading their apps around. Until then, however, will you have to rely on one of the other platforms supported by Disney. Will Disney Plus Come to Your Smart TV? If Disney Plus isn't compatible with your smart TV at launch, it probably won't. The reason behind this is that Disney is moving away from traditional smart TV devices, and focusing on more advanced devices, such as Apple and Android TV. The age of typical TV settings, not to mention your regular TV show is over and Disney knows this. Disney Plus With the November 12 release date just around the corner, we're all anxiously awaiting new updates from Disney. For now, however, if your device isn't on Disney Plus's compatibility list, you'll have to sit back and wait. Is your device on the compatibility list? What do you think of the lack of genuine smart TVs on the list? Participate in the discussion in the comments section below and feel free to ask any questions. Question.
