Hitoribocchi no marumaru seikatsu meaning

For context, the setting has Bocchi trying to be friends with everyone in her class to avoid being un friends in real life by her only friend, Yawara Kai. So yes, the show makes fun of the fact that an almost friendless and socially anxious middle-schooler has a name that pokes fun at her not-so-funny status. All this suggests the possibility of a hard-to-see experience, but Hitoribocchi is really a pleasant show. Bocchi's use of anxiety as a source of humor works because of the show's gentle approach and kind treatment of her. Her behavior and sometimes absurdity are funny, like when she sends text messages to remind her new friends of her existence, but the show does not lower Bocchi or give her a bad ending. She was also able to gradually improve her social skills throughout the show, often with the support of her new friends. The only problem is that even with the tone of the show, Kai's plan left a slightly bitter taste as it seemed very poorly thought out despite good intentions. At least it works well and creates some emotional moments between Bocchi and Kai. Photo source: IMDb Bocchi's new group of friends is a lovely group of people. There are three of them: Sunao Nako, Honshou Aru, and Sotoka Rakita, who are puns for the honest child (素直な子), which has a hidden nature (本性あ大), and Nako was the first person Bocchi made friends with, and my original favorite. She looks like an offender (despite being a cute and un smart person), but while her initial encounter with Bocchi is a bit frosty, she is finally kind and supportive of her. She is the straight man of the group, and also the slight frenemies with Aru. Bocchi begs Aru after Nako. She is the vice president of the blue eye class literally, and is constantly striving to become trusted sample students and classmates. Aru is a good good but her efforts are also an attempt to overcome her bad luck which often makes her seem like a goof (hereby puns the hidden nature, although the literally of honshou is of true nature). While most classes are unaware of Aru's unhappiness, it is often pointed out by Nako, who finds her situation very interesting. Aru turns annoyed by Nako's reaction as well as the tendency to call her omae (rudely to say you) and not by her name. Her typical reaction is to literally headbutt Nako. Both the headbutting punchline and the whole unfortunate aspect felt like shticks were not cooked to me at first. However, Hitoribocchi quickly changed my perspective with an episode focusing on Aru about a wardrobe accident involving elementary school uniforms and a silly tennis match. It's hard not to find the endearing girl when she has a self-inspiring character song where she sings lyrics like don't lose Aru and Perfect Aru. Photo source: IMDb Rakita, a foreign student, started out as the group's most one-dimensional member. At first, she was largely defined by her desire to become a ninja, which somehow led to her becoming Bocchi's anestheth. That, combined with the lack of synthetic power with Nako and Aru, made it difficult for me to like her character. Thankfully, Hitoribocchi overcomes this problem by developing her character and relationship with others, especially Bocchi. It happened a little late, but I'm still excited to see her fleshed out and maybe more suited to the dynamic of the group. Friendship between these girls is at the heart of the show as Bocchi attempts to make friends and overcome her social anxiety. Although the summary focuses on Bocchi, this is ultimately one of the high school comedies where it's about the lives of actors as a whole. It's really nice to see Nako, Aru, and Rakita encourage and support Bocchi, as well as the patience of the two formers towards her eccentricity (Rakita doesn't really notice since she's a bit of an airhead). Their slice-of-life experiences are also entertaining, and I find myself chuckling more and more as the show progresses. Some of the funniest moments are played by supporting character Oshie Teruyo, the home teacher, who has an intense fear of Nako's illegal appearance. The voice actors do a pretty solid job. This is the first time That Chisaki Morishita has been named in a named role, and she has successfully shown both the vulnerable and enthusiastic parts of Bocchi without over-making up either. Tanaka Minami mixes cute and scuffle like Nako, while Kitou Akari does Aru justice as the world's most classy vice president. Yuuko Kurose gives Sotoka an alien anime inflection, which I'm not crazy about, but it becomes endearing when human from an antho person to a genuine friend. Another highlight is that Kana who lends her her soft voice and special breath to her minor character Kako Kurai. The members of the public ethics committee are strict but have a soft side, which sometimes reminds me of Darling in FranXX's Ichigo, whom Kana also voices. Photo source: IMDb Hitoribocchi has a cute character design and a mostly bright color palette. There are a little too many blue clothes among the characters, but Nako's brown sweater luckily injects some kind and warm feeling that suits the character. The animations and presentations are solid both in showing and opening fun and ending songs. Hitoribocchi also brings things alive through the use of small pop-up panels, sometimes like talking or thinking bubbles, in photographs. I can't recall any example of this in other shows, but it doesn't feel like a new technique because the use of stylized expressions for humorou purposes in anime certainly isn't. However, both felt quite popular, mostly in the second half. As a result, this direction makes the show a little more special and interesting to watch. I had pretty low expectations of Hitoribocchi from the start, but Bocchi, Nako, Aru and Rakita turned out to be a pleasant crowd. It's not a standout watch, but it's a really nice and positive show, and that's good enough for me. Hitoribocchi no Marumaruseikatsu is available on Crunchyroll.
