I've heard the Latin phrase imperio in imperio used in political discussions a few times. While I understand what the phrase literally means in Latin (as ordered), I'm not sure what the intended meaning is when the phrase is referred to in English as a discussion of political strategy or reality. Meaning an empire in an empire, the Latin phrase imperium in imperio can be used literally to mean a self-governing state limited to a larger state, or to a rebellious state fighting for independence from another; or, more literally, for a department or group of workers in an organization that, despite appearing to work for themselves, is still subject to an even greater corporate penalty.
