Portage guide for early education

Autism (including Asperger's syndrome) is a lifelong disability and the concept of a cure is controversial for many autistic people and their families. However, there are a number of approaches that can support autistic people reaching their full potential. There are many different approaches, making it difficult to make the best decision to use. Because very few are independently or scientifically evaluated, there is much we don't know about their effectiveness. Bold claims are often made without any evidence to back them up about interventions and therapies for autistic people. It is irresponsible and inappropriate, and we try to keep people informed of current concerns in the news section. It is therefore vital that autistic people and parents/caregivers have access to reliable information and advice both after diagnosis and continuously. Autism is complex and helps what a person may not help others, so it is vital that each person is supported as an individual and that any interventions are adapted to their specific needs. There are communication-based, behavioral and educational approaches: PECS (Picture Exchange Communication System) SPELL (Structure, Positive, Empathy, Low arousal, Connections) TEACCH (Treatment of Children with Autism and Communication Disabilities) Social Stories speech and language therapy. The National Autistic Society believes interventions should be adapted to one's needs and monitored for impact. Biomedical interventions include restrictive diets, supplements, hormone interventions and medications. Some people argue that biomedical interventions should be used to 'treat autism', while others believe they are useful in treating situations that together. The National Autistic Society believes there is little scientific evidence to show the effectiveness of biomedical interventions in supporting them to 'manage their autism' rather than treat other conditions. As with many drug treatments, some biomedical interventions have associated side effects and risks. Autistic people may be more susceptible to these side effects. We believe that biomedical interventions should only be used under medical supervision by someone who understands autism, and the positive and negative effects should be reviewed regularly and carefully. The most comprehensive analysis of treatments and interventions was carried out by the National Institute for Health and Care Excellence (NICE). Autism spectrum disorder in adults: diagnosis and treatment look directly at therapy and interventions and was published in June 2012. In 2013, NICE issued guidance for children and young people with autism spectrum disorders under the age of 19: support and management. Both guidelines were developed by the health and social care team, families/caregivers and technical experts. The guidelines state a number of psychosocial interventions to consider for use in autistic children, teenagers and adults. For children and teenagers, this includes game-based strategies with parents, caregivers and teachers. These include employment support programs for adults, structured leisure activities and social skills training. They also rule out a number of biomedical interventions for 'management of the main symptoms of autism': Documents designed for teaching staff working with rural disabled and non-disabled children (up to 5 years of birth) provide a card file and direction manual listing English and Spanish versions of a list of behaviors, methods of teaching these behaviors, to record the developmental progress of an individual child. The guide offers instructions for developing an individualized curriculum in six developmental areas: infant stimulation, socialization, language, self-help, conknuality, and motor skills. Sections that use curriculum objectives (behavioral objectives, task analysis, help types, and correction procedures) using a checklist and card file following the definition of development areas; and implementation of curriculum goals (empowerment and prererererere conditions for learning). The checklist lists 140 behaviors and contains a field to enter the child's age level, input behavior, date reached, and comments. The card file provides instructions for developing skills related to the 140 behaviors in the checklist.
