Pop squad paolo bacigalupi

I finally graduated from Paolo Bacigalupi's Pump Six and other stories; so this omnibus post will cover the final five stories and any general comments I want to make. I previously posted Pump Six stories here, here and here. The last five stories I'll focus on today are Pop Squad (2006): in the future, when people are functionally immortal and creation is illegal, some people go off their immortality meds so they can have children; Our hero is one of the cops whose job is to track down these women and kill children. Bonus: People seem to live in the jungle, which was once a tundra, complete now with lots of monkeys. Yellow Card Man (2006): When a rich man in Malaysia, a hero was forced out by nationalist riots and is now trying to survive as one of the yellow cards of men (refugee immigrants), avoiding white uniformed Environment Ministry cops/murderers. It takes place in the Wind-Up Girl universe; and is a novella in length. Softer (2007): A man kills his wife, thinks his life is over, but when he gets away it, decides to rededicate himself to really live his life. The only non-science fiction story in the collection. Pump Six (2008): Reminiscent of Marching Moron and Idiocracy, the average man tries to save the city's idiots while keeping the sewer system working. Bonus: A man and his wife are trying to have a baby, hoping environmental polluters don't give them idiots; and the city is overrun by these monkey-like idiot hominids. Small Offers (2007): In a polluted world, a doctor wants to knock out contaminants from his body to have a normal child, which is a better alternative to having a dead child just to clear the contaminant for the benefit of the child. Softer is the anomaly, focusing more on the nature of thought processes than some of the environmental factors that he deals with. I want to make some literary analytical prestigation where I turn the story inside and suggest that the pattern is the same as his other... but it really doesn't seem all that similar. All other stories have a real interest in environmental/ecological issues, including polluters. Since the sand and slag folk heroes were physically impervious, usually people in these stories tend to be recalled by their environment. (Or in their parents' environment, where idiots children and troglodytes on Pump Six.) Pop Squad might be a little atypical here because what people are undone with is their own inbuilt urges to have children. Although they live in a world of climate change, the problem is not; the problem is that they have two genetic requirements at war: the desire to live and the desire to transfer their genes. Environmental issues seem secondary. Yellow Card Man, Pump Six and Small Offerings all tell the story of someone struggling with the environment, is that include dangerous people; idiots and polluters; Pollutants. All right, all right, I told you what they're all about; but how good are they? Yellow Card Man is clearly a standout here, not as a story – it's almost a structureless meander through the lives and incidents of an old man – but as a world that he is building. It's hard to say because I've already read another Wind-Up story and knows that was the world of his novel; but this world seems the richest and most interesting. He is also the author of young adult novels, Ship Breaker, and several short stories, most of which can be found in his award-winning collections, Pump Six and other stories. In 2006, his story Calorie Man won the Theodore Sturgeon Memorial Award and was nominated for the Hugo Award; in 2007, a story made in the same world, the Yellow Card Man, also gave Hugo an election. People of Sand and Slag, which first appeared in 2004, was a finalist for both the Hugo and Nebula awards. In a world that is rebuilding itself from the devastation of global warming, in New York, the edges of which are absorbed into the jungle, life is floating above monkeys and tropical trees, men and women perform art, create music, and never grow old. This is life after what you're done. Rejoice: this is the elixir of life, a chemical revival anyone can buy. It keeps the body slim and full of youth and pulls stops aging. A quick trip to the clinic gives the person a whole new rental life. But just because there is no mortality does not mean that there are no crimes or no police reign criminals. Our next story narrator might like to visit the symphony, but in his day job, he's a police officer who fights against the population explosion. Because if no one dies, there is no reason to create, and the world is still healing from environmental disasters, children are the new America's Most Wanted, and they receive the death penalty. When there really is a fountain of youth, what price is we willing to pay for a drink? Click the thumbnail to go to Google Books. Loading...
