The conflict between Australian rugby and New Zealand rugby and allowing the All Blacks to return to their families in time for Christmas, however, may come at a cost for the Kiwis. The Rugby Championship, set to take place as a six-headed pair from November 7 to December 12, has ignited a fierce debate between Australia and New Zealand over time after NZR claimed it had not approved plans for the All Blacks to face the Wallabies on its final day. Under the restrictions New Zealand, currently back home after the December 12 clash will force players and coaching staff into quarantine to keep them apart from the family on Christmas Day. Now the Sydney Morning Herald claims to have offered to meet on Saturday October 31 - a week before a four-team match between the Wallabies, All Blacks, Springboks and Pumas has begun with the Bledisloy Cup starting this Sunday 11th in Wellington and followed by a second clash at Eden Park on October 18, the only way the plan can go ahead is subject to reduced quarantine restrictions when both teams travel to Australia. The team will remain in quarantine until November.
