DEFCON is held in Las Vegas every year and is attended by some of the top hackers, computer security experts and tech geeks around. But how do people break into computer systems? One of the most popular ways to take down a website is a distributed denial of service attack. For example, Anonymous pulled out of Scientology's website in January 2008. How it works is a hacker flooding the web server with maps. If the server is unable to process all these requests, it goes offline. What makes a DDoS attack so popular is that there's no good defense against it. INTERESTING HACK RELATED READS ON ALLTECHBUZZ - The new 'BuckHacker' Search Engine you can easily find Hackable ServersFortunately, this type of attack does not give attacker access to the system. Another common attack is DNS cache poisoning. Also known as DNS spoofing, DNS cache poisoning is based on tricking your computer into thinking it connects to a website. But really, it's connecting to the hacker's computer. DNS cache poisoning was responsible for China's Great Firewall, blocking computers in the US from using Facebook and Twitter in 2010. Buffer Overflow attacks were a common way for a hacker to gain control of a system. BUFFER is a temporary storage area where Programs store information. If a buggy program allows a hacker to write information outside of restricted storage buffers, it can cost programs to crash or respond in unexpected ways.
