How to solve foreign policy problems Today's American Foreign Policy Citizen and Foreign Policy Christine Barber teaches at Hatton Honors College in Political Science and Indiana University, and has become increasingly interested in how teachers in large classes can make the most of what students learn. She is working with an online course designer to create an online version of her intro to american politics classes. In Indiana, as a Lily Fellow, she works on projects that increase student retention in large introductory courses and is a member of the Freshman Learning Project, a university-wide effort to improve the first-year undergraduate experience. She served on the New York Times College Advisory Board and worked with other educators to develop ways to integrate newspaper reading into the undergraduate curriculum. She has won several educational honors, but the two awarded by her students mean most to her: the Indiana University Student Alumni Award for Outstanding Faculty and the Indiana University Chapter of the Professional Journalists Association Brown Derby Award. When he doesn't teach or write textbooks, Professor Barber is looking forward to playing with dogs, traveling with co-authors and writing about food. She is the food editor of Bloom Magazine in Bloomington and co-author of Indiana Cooks! (2005) and Home Gloun Indiana (2008). She also makes jewelry from precious metals and rough gems, and if she retires, she will open a jewelry store on a renovated air stream on the beach in Appalachicola, Florida, where she plans to write another cookbook and a book on local politics, development and fishing. Gerald C. Wright has taught political science at Indiana University since 1981 and now chairs politics.Department. An accomplished scholar of American politics and winner of the National Political Policy Association's Career Achievement Award ™ in 2010, his book includes State Legislature Democracy: Public Opinion and Policy in the United States (1993), co-authored with Robert S. Erickson and John P. McIver, and has published more than 50 articles on elections, public opinion and national politics. Professor Wright has long studied relationships between citizens, their preferences and public policy. He is currently conducting research funded by grants from the National Science Foundation and the Russell Sage Foundation on factors affecting equality in state and congressional policy expression. He has also written a book on representation in the U.S. Congress. He has been a consultant to Project Voting Smart in the past few elections. Professor Wright is a member of the Indiana University ™ Freshman Learning Project, a university-wide effort to improve the undergraduate experience of first-year students ™ by focusing on how today's college students learn and how teachers can adapt their teaching methods to teach them best. In his non-working hours, Professor Wright also likes to spend time with his dog, travel, eat good food, eat fish and play golf. Golf.
