Common words are the words where all the letters of a word represent their most common sounds. The second most difficult group of common words is known as CCVC (consonant consonant vocal consonant) words. One reason why CCVC words are considered among the hardest common words is the consonant mix at the beginning. As readers and spellers tend to sound individual sounds they associate with each letter, students may struggle to create a mixed sound to produce the correct sound combination that matches the word. Takes the word frog, for example. A starter reader can be heard the letters loudly at a time: /el/ /ar/ /oh/ /geel/. A possible initial pronunciation can be described phonetically as /el/ /rogl/. The early reader has already achieved a basic mastery of CVC words. It is easier to treat frog as the first consonant sound followed by a CVC construction (rog) that makes sense to them. Regular evaluation of basic phonic mastery and spelling can determine normal childhood language development. It is important to investigate and evaluate the failure to achieve a basic mastery of phonetics, as this may indicate learning difficulties or neurological factors. Use the lists above to regularly check students' progress when it comes to reading CCVC words. Phonics remains a staple of early spelling and word recognition and CCVC words can present early challenges for young students. Try a graduated approach to these more complicated common words by building on the consonant combinations. You can then learn the incorporation of the mixtures in whole words.
