It was released in 1984 by Atlantic Records. Both albums were produced by Harry Belafonte, a Calypso artist best known for the 1956 hit Day-O (Banana Boat Song), a prolific free music producer and remer Arthur Baker, who collaborated with music artists including Freeze, Afrika Bambaata, and The New Order. [2] [3] Both albums entered until the Billboard 200 and Or&B albums charts and remained there in the same year. [4] The soundtrack contains music mainly from old-school hip-hop artists including Grand Master Mile Mile and The Furious Five, Jazzy Jay, Afrika Bambaataa & Sonic Soul & Three Treacherous Featuring Pioneers beatbox Doug E. Fresh but also various electric/dance musicians like Freeze, Order and Juicy. [6] The album was certified gone in the same year. [7] [8] Planning a third volume was, but it was never released. The second volume is not released on the CD. But the music was still in its commercial infancy at the time, and Hollywood figured that the soundtrack was crammed with electro funk from the Los Angeles supercycle, like juicy give me everything and not at night, was a more salable alternative. Despite the involvement of Camp Afrika Bambaata - Arthur Baker produced a decent battle cry for rock revenge, while Jazzy Jay offers similarly listening son of Pitt Street - things get bad here in a hurry, and rare access with Ralph Rolle's silly phony four MC - Wappin, the kind of opportunistic novelty song that suggests that anyone can rap (and proved at once that wasn't). Not coincidentally, the only bright spot that happens to be the only authentic hip-hop song that included: the three wonderful treacherous Santa Rap, which features Col Mo De and the company that takes on Saint about sorry Christmas in the ghetto.
