The story of the essay writer on April 24, 2020, Isamus and Ibe are examples of the story or the story of the mysterious En Simbi in another play known as the Dream of a Midsummer Night. The play was written in 1590 by veteran poet and actor William Shakespeare. This play is somehow similar to another play of Shakespeare known as Juliet and Romeo. This act was of three couples who had just married, celebrated, feasted, and had fun. A piece of paper documenting the number of people who needed to be performed was brought by the pistoster. Theseus has just read the list that i just imported to choose one of the most interesting performances. The couple is fascinated by the play Piramus and Ibe. Quince then introduces the play. The three couples then commented on the following questions about the play: Then the character was introduced and the play began (Tammy and Saxby, pg.7). In the story, Piramus and his neighbor Yves fell in love. The biggest challenge the couple faced was the adversity between the families. Couples were forbidden to meet each other when their parents were dating. Due to those factors, they often communicate through wall cracks on wall fences that separate their houses. The couple decided to meet at Ninus's tomb. They wanted to meet to relieve the curiosity surrounding the relationship. When Ibe arrived at the tomb, he had just finished his prayers and found a lion with blood in his mouth. He escaped from the predator and remained behind the veil. When Piramus arrived at the tomb, he was frustrated when he saw a blood-stained veil. He was frustrated because he thought his partner had been killed by a lion. Piramus fell on a knife that killed himself. Ibe later returned to the tomb and learned that his lover had died. She was deeply troubled by the encounter until she fell to the sword of suicide. The gods were bloodied by the incidence of turning mulberry into crimson. It is true that the story of Pyramus and Ibe is directly related to the romeo and juliet story, and it brings to many critics the confusion of the first stories written (Delcorno and Pietro, pg.41). Apart from the two dramas that highlight the issues of social convection and love, this story is directly parallel to the stories of Juliet and Romeo. It is clear that the talented writer mocked his love story Juliet and Romeo through The Burlesque. In addition to the author's other dramas, the story of Pyramus and Ibe developed from a written source, because there is no written source for the dream of a midsummer night. Story. The story is believed to have been created by a group of mechanics used by Shakespeare to reinforce the subject of forbidden love. Another reason Shakespeare used this story in his midsummer night's dream was to bring the audience's different classes together. For example, the audience consists of working class, actors, and mechanics that seem different in many ways. During this period of play, there was a thick line of social distinction among the European people. Many other poetries, which existed during that time, also used cartoons to try to end social differences at the time. Similar stories of Romeo and Juliet reveal more social distinctions. The tactical writer is also thought to have brought a tragic story to educate young people who attended the audience and other audiences of the latter generation. He apparently taught that every young love has a bitter ending with tears. Young lovers can live happily through infidelity, but their endings are generally tragic. With the exception of young people who live for love, we must shed tears at a time when love ends through death or in other ways. The play Has Two Protagonists and Other Minor Characters, with The Play Piramus and Ibe mentioned to support the theme as well as the story along with the story. The first character very popular in the story is Piramus. According to the author the characters mentioned are apparently young, perhaps in his teenage years (Kamati and Anna, pg.19). He is truly passionate and a model of the rest of the young people who existed during the Renaissance. The young character looks good, according to the author. The character seemed impressive to the young lady Thisbe when she often communicated through the cracks that separate the house. I do piramimus? 've. This character's character is mainly on display of how the young man reacted when he saw the tent. Is the act of killing himself from Bale's exhibition alone a valid reason for showing that he was a character? I've been informed incorrectly and lack edits. If the character wasn't native, he would have taken the time to investigate the matter before making a decision to kill himself one day. The other protagonist in the story is Isbe. In the analysis of the character Piramus, then this is young and also she is evident in her teenage years. This bestono is in deep love with her lover Pifirus, and the character can easily be portrayed by the act of killing herself after she finds his lover already dead. This is also circular. After she learns that his lover has died, the character can be easily identified from the act of suicide. No more emphasis on her as being typical, the act of taking of himself She regarded their love as being connected by the Spirit, not by flesh or blood. She also decides, and this can be seen when she plans to meet in the previous tomb with Piramus to show her commitment to intimate relationships to him. Like her lover she is also native. The author displays this trait when it means how the character can't control her grief until she took her precious life with a knife. However, her character sounds like an inspiration to many young people who have lived during that time, and the challenges faced by young couples are similar. Another important character in the play is the Lion. This lion is the one chasing Ibe until she drops her veil and then the lion shades it with blood. When Piramus discovered the veil, he thought Ibe was dead and forced him to commit suicide. Orpheus was another musical character whose wife was killed by a snake bite. Eurydice is an important character in the play and is the wife of Orpheus. Another character in the story goes on a journey across the ocean but dies (Delcono and Pietro, pg.41). When Seise dies, he turns into a turtle. Seise married his wife, Alcion. Alcion learned of her husband's death in her dream and hoped to see them again. Another character from Pygmalion was the King of Cyprus, who fell in love with a statue of a woman. The statue later gave life to Galathea. Galatia was another notable figure who converted to life from being a statue of Aphrodite in response to King Pygmalion's prayers. Bausys was an old couple, who once hosted Hermès and Zeus. They were rewarded with never separation, and when they died, they turned into trees. Lemon was another character who hosted Zeus and Hermès when neighbors refused to host them. The couple received some rewards, such as being saved from the flood, and their desire to die at the same moment changed to a tree after their death. In the play, Endimion was a shepherd and fell in love with Seien. In the story, Daphne fell in love with the daughter of Sinn Féin, and although she did not love him, he did not leave him. Daphne turned her into a tree because he wanted to protect her. Alfeus was the god of the river and loved Aretusa until one day she was tired of turning her into water. Aretusa is a woman who was driven by Alpheus and turned into a spring water. The story Piramus and Ibe are examples of class love stories, and many styles have been used to prepare the main story line of the story (Tammie and Saxby, pg.7). The most notable styles the author uses are similarities. The similarity of the story appears because the story is similar to the stories of Juliet and Romeo written by the same author during the same period. Both stories are similar because of the theme. The symbols look similar to each other. Symbolism is another style used to develop stories. The story has many symbols, but the main symbols are mulberry and walls. The wall separated the young lovers, but the link between the two young lovers existed to sink. The chin on the wall symbolizes that separating the two hearts in love with each other is meaningless. Another symbol of the barrier is the parents of Piramus and Ibe. Despite their feelings of love for each other, the two parents decided to create a barrier by preventing them from meeting each other. Finally, at the end of the story, the parents agree that the two were indeed in true love. They accepted that the two couples would break the initial barriers between them and be buried together. Another symbol of the wall or wall was the lion. It dismantles the plan for them to meet each other and express love, and chase the away Ibe. The sword is a symbol of the power of control that lovers have. The two lovers used knives to commit suicide and take their own lives. Lovers decided to control their lives with the idea that if they would not face any obstacles or restrictions, they would continue to meet their romance in heaven. Mulberry is a major symbol of the degree of love that the two couples had together. The original color was darkened by shady blood by two young couples who turned it into a red symbol of true love. Until now, the fruit of the tree is presented as a gift of love in many parts of the world. Tragic love is the main theme of the story. The main storyline of the play is about the desperate love that Piramus and Ibe had together (Pratt, Karen, pg.257). With the exception of the two protagonists, the other minor characters mentioned in the previous narrative analysis are also victims of tragic relationships. If the love of the protagonist had been freed by allowing parents to marry, their sudden death would not have been ruled. The theme of dreams is also shown in the play the theme of hope and planning. The protagonist was very hopeful and dreaming of living together and breaking the barriers that exist in his life. However, as with other ancient love stories their dreams were closed by the lions, their parents and other series of barriers gradually disturbed them. The subject of trust and distrust was also highlighted in the story. The protagonist seemed to trust each other for an extension of the plan to meet each other in a secret place of the tomb. Despite the fact that the two couples trusted each other, their parents did not trust them. They were paranoid and refused any bid to appear in court freely until Piramus and Ibe devised another way to marry or meet in other ways. Their love. Piramian Abime of Piramimus and Ibe is a play that the author used to describe how love was hindered, which can bring problems to lovers, parents, and the rest of society. Some scholars believe it is one of the oldest love stories in modern Britain. The play has been repeated many times in many theaters and used by many literary teachers in literature.
