The answer by rjpond is good. I just want to add that using a simple interrogative past means you are referring to one particular utterance in the past. What I'm saying is the equivalent of what one specific thing I say. This is the reason that what I have said is not used if someone wants an answer to what specific things I say that offend you. On the other hand, what I have said leaves open the possibility that you may have said more than one thing or the same thing several times. For example, if someone says you often say things that offend me, then the right question is, What have I said that offends you? Now the answer could be a list of things I say. In fact, this is the reason we often hear things like what I've said about leaving your clothes on the floor? The implication is that a restless parent has said this many times. What is now perfect means there is the possibility of immortality or repetition. A simple past is instance specific.
