Videos quickly filed in: The massacre is a false flag, a hoax, a distraction. Here's the truth about the shooting. This is my theory. The telegraphing continued on theories about Cesar Sayoc, the Florida man accused of sending mail bombs to high-profile Democrats. Full_Metal_Joker was referring to the fake bombing suspect, but gave viewers a warning before diving into them: Everything I have to say is largely based on an opinion with the lining of truth. Those reactionary vlogs weren't on YouTube; From 1999 to 2007, they were on BitChute, a peer-to-peer platform powered by BitTorrent that claims to offer a place for freedom of expression and decentralized distribution. When YouTube crashed for two hours on October 16, people feverishly searched Vimeo, Dailymotion and Pornhub as alternatives. There have been jokes on social media about how addicted people are to YouTube, and the outburst highlighted just how huge and ubiquitous the platform still is. On the other corner, however, people have been proposing BitChute as an anticensor, a free speech haven for YouTubers who have become disillusioned with the corporate tech giant, or claim to have been censored, or, in the case of the InfoWars conspiracy factory, banned. Over the last year, YouTube has had to revisit its house. He had trouble spreading white supremacist ideologies, conspiracy theory videos that reached the trending site, fake news promoted to a wider audience, and white nationalist channels coordinating video manipulation. The creators have been accused of profiting from videos about mental health issues and producing harmful children's content, and YouTube has been criticized for not being tough enough on popular creators who post offensive material, such as the Logan Paul suicide forest disaster since January. In March, the hashtag #YouTubePurge began circulating again, as creators claimed YouTube censors them, deletes subscribers and issues strikes to accounts for copyright infringement breaches of community guidelines. That's around the same time youTube CEO Susan Susan He said on stage at SXSW that the company would use Wikipedia to combat conspiracy theories, prompting a chorus of heavy sighs - as if crowdsourced a hive of blog posts here was a sufficient moral compass. Since January 2017, BitChute has presented itself as an independent news outlet, but also welcomed the kind of disinformation videos that YouTube is grappling with; partisan, racist and far-reaching absurdities that YouTube has tried to beat up. How far can he really stretch his mission of freedom of expression? BitChute flea market in BitChute - which uses the same red and red color scheme in its logo as YouTube, and a pretty similar look with headers for popular and trending videos - you can find make-up tutorials, wine reviews, DIY toilet repair. There are reviews of movies and games, and pop-culture websites such as WatchMojo, which has more than 19 million YouTube subscribers, have recently jumped on BitChute. The pieces feel like a shock site from the '90s Rotten.com. On a recent float through the site, I found a video of a miniature monkey sucking its own dick. A video titled [HOT] Teen Sexy Yoga Personal Training Workout has more than 72,000 views, of course. You can also find a video called Auschwitz-Why gas chambers are a myth, and under the hashtag #holohoax there are several other videos trying to expose the Holocaust. You'll find a channel called Black Crimes Matter, with a slogan that reads: This channel is dedicated to portraying the true nature of black people. It's a biological weapon intended to destroy Western civilization. Another channel, called Klan Archives, contains archival recordings of Ku Klux Klan rallies and speeches, as well as current ones. Wolfclan Armory, an Oregon gun store that is reportedly trying to revive a decades-old group of white supremacists, launched a channel on BitChute after it was kicked off YouTube last year. His mouth name, Jake Laskey, was previously imprisoned for the 2002 attack on a synagogoga. The channel is mostly videos where it antagonizes antifa and plays with knives. (He was recently jailed again for stabbing Devin Reid Wolfe, a fellow white supremacist.) BitChute hosts videos of Scott Rhodes, an Idaho man with reported ties to the white supremacist site Road to Power that was linked to a racist robocall allegedly by Florida gubernatorial candidate Andrew Gillum. Rhodes released a new video on Oct. 20 discussing robocalls; web address theroadtopower.com currently redirects to its BitChute page. InfoWars is one of the High Profile BitChute channels; It has more than 28,000 subscribers, and InfoWars contributors invited viewers to head to BitChute. Its most popular videos have more than 10,000 views, although one of the most watched videos is host Alex Jones who addresses censorship by other platforms, and censorship is high BitChute, bitchute. However, many other InfoWars videos failed to break 1000 views; including multiple videos claiming the mail bomber was a hoax. According to BitChute Community Guidelines, it is not about oppression or incitement or bias of the platform. It also emphasizes equality for users: Viewers should decide through objective criteria such as views, likes, and subscriptions that authors are most prominent across BitChute, with the expectation that widely accepted and supported content will rise to the top. This may seem like an ideal business model, especially when creators are fleeing to similar alternative free speech platforms like Minds, DTube and Gab. This week, online payments company Stripe suspended activity with Gab, a far-right response on Twitter, after it was revealed that a suspect in the Pittsburgh shooting was posted there. Stripe terminated his BitChute account in June, citing pressure from financial partners, according to an email published on BitChute's forum. (We have reached out to Stripe for comment.) As of now, BitChute lists Patreon and PayPal for donations, as well as Ethereum and BitCoin, instead of a formal monetization system. Despite the widely accepted and supported content that often rises to the top, which, according to popular and trending sites, is difficult for right-leaning politics, BitChute founder Ray Vahey tells the Daily Dot that the site welcomes content from different categories and from people of all backgrounds and adds that it has become very popular in politics and news, and that's partly because we are one of the few neutral places where independent news can publish and be treated fairly in 2018. Last month, they reportedly saw more than half a million active videos. You will find a lot of reminders of 2018 in this so-called neutral place: videos about Trump (both positive and negative); QAnon, a Trump-focused conspiracy theory that has made several failed predictions; warriors of social justice; validity and me. Sampling recent trends offers more context for what's popular: Trump, InfoWars, gaming, MAGA. Over the summer, Rick and Morty co-creator Dan Harmon quit Twitter after a controversial 2009 shr. One version of the clip has more than 236,000 views. In the Cuisine category, one of the trends of the month features a thumbnail of a topless woman passing out on a picnic table, with the caption Christine Blasey (Ford) at a pool party, alongside reviews of beer and wine and a vintage cereal commercial. In music, one trending video from Jewtube69 titled Black Lives Will Never Matter shows a character called Moonman in front of a Nazi flag. Other song titles liberally use the N-word. Vahey says they're removing any videos that were found our community terms and guidelines include pornography, pirated movies, doxing, illegal material such as terrorist content or violence-inciting content. Vahey, who is from the UK, previously worked as a software engineer. He is also an animator, having created children's webseries on the YouTube channel Little Rockstar. She says the idea for BitChute was born in 2016, when I noticed that many of the content creators I followed were reporting increased levels of censorship and demonetization. YouTube has changed greatly in recent years by gradually becoming more corporate and boring, he says. They are now more likely to recommend videos from CNN or Saturday Night TV hosts than the types of independent authors who helped build that platform, and we are entering that gap. BitChute's rock star Styxhexenhammer666, one of BitChute's more popular creators, has more than 30,000 subscribers. He often wears a leather jacket, often shirtless, and mostly talks about current political news and the dangers of big technology. He publishes books called Tarl Warwick, focusing on occult and spiritualism, after writing about ASMR, gun control, psychotropics, aliens and Turning negativity into ambition. Earlier this year, he announced his candidacy for governor of Vermont. However, this offer has been finalised. He tells the Daily Dot that his use of the fundraising platform Patreon may have come under scrutiny in terms of the campaign contributions he received - and it would surely have been a matter of discussion if I had been on stage with a bunch of co-fundraisers. He says cleaning up YouTube has actually helped build his audience, and certainly includes those with far-right views who may have been censored themselves. He claims his audience aspires to libertarianism and civic nationalism, although some are still there for occult things, and he has appeared in shows that trade in white nationalist ideologies, like the YouTube channel Red Ice. Warwick's YouTube channel has more than 300,000 subscribers, and his earlier videos, around 2013 or 2014, are more focused on the occult and religion. Although he still posts on YouTube and BitChute, he says his views haven't changed since those earlier videos so far - instead, with the era changing there was a change in what was important to talk about. Recent videos on important topics include The Mail Bomber is Almost Certain a Liberal who Listens to Legacy Media Fearmongers and Gab Gets Infowars'd by the Corporate Authoritarians, to Great Applause by Thoughtslaves. I feel censored on YouTube, yes, but not as much as some people, he says, and while I still enjoy YouTube, it's just a general feeling that the platform has started to move in a very negative direction, away from independent users and free and towards increased policing on the site and more corporate brands from which we have all started using YouTube to get away at all. READ MORE: Several recent surveys have shown that YouTube has further radicalised right-leaning viewers and that the platform has made it easier for hate speech to reach more viewers. Back in March, techno-sociologist Zeynep Tufekci wrote about YouTube's radical-right reach, and the chasm that is its algorithm: What we are witnessing is a computational exploitation of natural human desire: to look 'behind the curtain,' to dig deeper into something that involves us. As we click and click, we are carried by an exciting sense of revealing more secrets and deeper truths. YouTube takes viewers down the rabbit hole of extremism, while Google piles up ad sales. On BitChute, there's not the same push into iffy related content that YouTube has struggled with (and made money), and there are no ads. Many creators on BitChute have a brand or image they're pushing, personalities they've shaped over the years on YouTube, and an audience that could follow them to a new platform. But smaller creators are still trying to figure out how to build fanbases. Hashtags and freedom of speech Vanessa Berben, who runs the 2FingersBerben channel, continues to post on YouTube to discuss and advocate for mental health. But her bitchute posts largely resemble her support for the conservative #WalkAway movement, which advocates disillusioned liberals joining the right. (Berben discovered she was volunteering for #WalkAway campaign.) The movement gained some momentum over the summer, but also had some plot holes, like Twitter bot accounts and photos without the fees used for promotion. Alex Jones made a donation to GoFundMe campaigns over the summer, and #WalkAway Brandon Straka appeared on InfoWars in September. Straka was suspended from Facebook the same month for posting a link to an infowars interview. Berben has just over 20 subscribers and tells the Daily Dot that she definitely joined BitChute out of love of free speech, but I struggle to find an audience there in the same way I found it on YouTube. From what I have heard from other users, they try to switch for the same reasons and many have the same problems. She joined #WalkAway movement in July after having enough growing intolerance for the various opinions and violence coming from the far left and far right. More recently, Berben has advocated for #TrumpChallenge, urging viewers to scrape away from the mainstream media for the week leading up to mid-term to avoid fake news about Trump. Berben is a former entertainment journalist who wrote for HuffPo but says she is no longer professionally attached to anyone and that gives me freedom tell my opinion that unfortunately many Americans do not. When asked if he now considers himself a Trump supporter, and whether he thinks his actions and ideologies are good for mental health, he replies: It's a shame if someone feels that way, anyone who believes the other person is responsible for their own mental health is doing himself a favor. I don't consider myself a Trump 'supporter' per se because he sometimes says things that make me cry. He currently has my vote because I feel the Democratic Party holds some damaging positions, such as their position on immigration. We reached out to YouTube to see if there were any thoughts on this alternative video platform. But Vahey sees BitChute as competition, and a way to push back against larger, more powerful social media companies. I have long believed that people should have the right to think freely and discuss topics such as the daily news, and this right should not belong only to large corporations, he says. The internet, along with social media, has played an important role in securing this fundamental human right and it would be a great shame to lose it. In fact, I believe it would harm society as a whole because freedom of expression is how we solve our social problems and keep the people who govern us in check. But if we look back at the Pittsburgh shooting, or the Florida post office bomber, or even the white nationalist march in Charlottesville, Virginia in 2017, which ended with the death of a woman, it's clear that freedom of expression often means freedom of expression with racist, hateful attitudes. On sites like BitChute, Twitter, YouTube and Gab, this often happens without consequences. BitChute wants to be a rogue ship in a video ecosystem that fights censorship, but when violent, extremist, white supremacist content is still flourishing and reaching audiences on YouTube, is that really the alternative? And as its user base grows, will bitchute just end up facing the same problems that YouTube is still coming up with? Out?
