Alice commits suicide because she has lost all possible identities. Running ceases to exist as an option because Alice cannot claim any of the identities she should embrace in order to flee. She can't see herself as a fiery young rebel willing to risk whippings, dog attacks, and the death that running away could involve. After years with Rufus, she can't see her as Isaac's wife, so desperate to with her husband that he would run away from the weylin plantation to find him. Alice can't accept one of the identities she would have to live in order to stay on the plantation either. Because she thinks Rufus sold her children, she can no longer think of herself as a mother. Although she found some measure of peace with Rufus, she cannot conceive of continuing to live The man who robbed her of her children, and so she can no longer think of her as Rufus's grudging partner. Alice commits suicide because it becomes impossible for her to imagine a way to exist in the world. What does Rufus think of Dana? Because Kindred is called first-person, from Dana's perspective, we never get to look into Rufus' head. Besides, Rufus doesn't speak directly about his feelings for Dana. From his actions, however, we can reap that for Rufus, Dana is every key female figure rolled into one. She's his mother, sister, lover, and wife. At the beginning of the novel, Dana is a better parental figure for Rufus than Margaret Weylin. She teaches him rudimentary morality and shows him that the conventional wisdom of his day is wrong. As Rufus grows up, he sees Dana as a sister. The two argue, fight each other and threaten each other as much as the brothers. Eventually, Rufus' love for Dana becomes sexual. He's as attracted to her as he is to Alice. Although he loves Alice and loves to live with her, Rufus feels a little more for Dana. She respects her intelligence and needs to talk to her to feel healthy. Knowing Dana is the closest Rufus comes to understanding marriage and partnership as modern people conceive of it. The varied and powerful roles Dana plays for Rufus explain that she is strong. All these roles are also tainted, however, by the ubiquitous master-slave dynamic, which intensifies as Rufus ages. None of Dana's roles – mother, sister, girlfriend, wife – replace her role as Rufus' subordinate. Dana often forgets this fact, but Rufus does not, after Butler reminds us. What do Dana's experiences say about modern America? Dana's journey past and back is meant to remind us of the attempts of the African-American community, and Americans in general, to understand and reach agreement with the history of slavery in the United States. Like many Americans, Dana knew she had slaves in her ancestors, but before she began the time journey, she knew little more about her relatives and their personal struggles than what she could reap from the history books. She was disconnected from her family history both because of a lack of a record and because of her own indifference. Kevin is also disconnected. Although Butler does not suggest that Kevin's family owned slaves, she does not say they did not. He barely knows his own sister; shocks him to learn that she has adopted her husband's racist beliefs. He certainly doesn't know about the politics of his ancestors. To understand their origins - and to appreciate what it means to be an interracial couple in modern times - Dana and Kevin need to come to a more complete understanding of the past. their case, it takes a physical journey in the past to gain understanding. But Butler suggests that Americans who want to deal with slavery must travel back in time, at least metaphorically, to witness its horrors. Horrors.
