Ghost of a chance adrienne rich analysis

The figurative tongue of the Holy Spirit in a chance by Adrienne Rich creates a palpable tone of despair and image of despair as a useless witness witness a person struggles for, with eventual loss, brightness in a world seeking to surface free thoughts. The title itself is the first example of a figurative meaning of the meaning of the poem, in that it takes a common phrase where a chance is described as improved by its comparison of a ghostly exists. He invoked an image of a word thing, but immortal in spirit, watched and translucent. Like this fading memory of a man, the poem describes the deterioration of man's chances to reach a conclusion while trying to think (2). This poem puts the reader in the position as an observer, using blunt, effective dictions like the single line that has terrified (7) to promote the fact that as observers, they cannot intervene. The observer then forced to watch the man instantly transform into a floppy fish, narrowed by the sea, as everything (4), representing the various pressures and stress of the world, falling into him and killing his contemplation. The old consolation (8) are supposed to be something with which a reader can be identified, and common justification is used to prevent one from thinking about something in a controversial or different way. The image of this average man, desperately wasted for a concept beyond average, is the acin of a dead fish crawling across gravel in an inospitable environment because despite the throes, he believes the journey journey to be worth the solution. However, as when becoming vague, the creature is sucked back into the calm, safe environment it has always called the house, but at costs forever comes to light. In the ghost of a chance by Adrienne Rich, the poet uses an extended simile to highlight the unease of a man who let himself think in an area he isn't comfortable with. In this poem, the speaker is watching a deep man of thought, which can go against what society deemed to be a correct and normal thing to do. Suddenly, the man stopped his independent thoughts as he slipped back into old consolation (8) which are compared to a fish /half die from flopping (10-11). This simile is extended further into the poem as the poet describes the fish, which is thought of the man, in agonizing / the air (15-16). However, this thought ultimately found alleviation in the triumphant/sea (18-19). Air and sea are both personified in the Holy Spirit of Luck. Air freedom contests, and because the air causes 'the fish' effectively means that they think the independent man does not have to ease where they are now. They can go against what the society believes in, and therefore the man is nervous about having these thoughts in the first place. These thoughts eventually end up in triumphant sea. The sea represents society with the thoughts and ideas made by the public in general. Because the ocean is victorious, it feels accomplished to keep one of its own from becoming more intellectual. A fish belongs to the sea, just like thinking a man's wish to be part of the belief that was made in society he lives in. The figurative language used in the poem shows that no matter how a tough man to reach belief greater than his society will always go back to his old ways where he is at his greatest comfort. The title of this poem gives an understanding of the holy Adrienne Rich of a chance by metonymically connected to the deeper meaning of one's insecurity across life. The conclusion of the title supports the poet's desire to relate to a different approach to the thought of the rich figurative language used throughout the poem. The poem starts from Rich introducing You see a man / trying to think (1-2) to give an introductory statement in what the poem truly about. The significance of this line suggests a person's desire to think a different way of society and the figurative language of all poems in promoting the depth of meaning of Rich tries to mean they mean. Submissive overall in the old consolation / is finding it at last / such a fish / half die from flopping / and almost pulling / via the shingle (8-13) continuously with metony Antichrist suggests the relievers succumb to his surge pull[ing] him turned blind to the triumphant sea (16-18), showing how someone who is starting to think a different way, or regarded as a rebellious as suggested by the connotation of the old consolation/they will find it at last (8-9), will be forced back into one's original thoughts. The fact that the wave pulled it back blind in the triumphant sea compared to the fact that the fish / half die from flopping / and almost pulling across the salt is representative of the liter of the one that does not fit into the normal, represented by almost breathing (15) through the use of the figurative language. In general, the poet figuratively describes one's internal liter by metonymically meaning a deeper meaning of thinking lighting and its effect on a person. Poets, essay, and cultural Adrienne Rich are among the writers who most widely admired and thought-induced in the United States. He received the Yale Younger Award in 1951, at the age of twenty-one, and has since received fifteen volumes of poets, including Diving in the Wreck (1972), for which he received the National Award. Her essay and poems teach across the country through most English programs and women's studies courses. It is the beneficiary of almost every major literary award as the 1999 Lannan Achievements Foundation for Lifelong Achievements, an academy of American poet poets, and MacArthur Genius Grant.
