Here at GeekTech, the entire team eagerly awaited the launch of the Lego Minecraft collection because it was just a small possibility in December. Since then, the good people at Lego CUUSOO and the Minecraft community have generated enough attention for Lego to approve the collections, and you can finally get a glimpse of the final project. Named Lego Minecrafter Micro World, three Lego fans have developed the final design: Chris Malloy, Kyle Tingi, and Biarney Tveskov. The group consists of a typical mine with mountainous terrain on top, and all the base minerals hidden underground. The collection includes two characters — Steve and, of course, creepy. As with many Lego sets, not only are there differences in construction, but also a lot of bricks to create your minecraft playground. According to cuusoo blog: The concept has taken quite a trip from the original concept images in a 2x2 brick scale. Once the group saw the concepts of the small scale, there was no doubt that this was the right direction for the product. Biarsen Bandoro Tiliskov, himself a former Lego model designer, said the scale packs most of Minecraft's DNA in the model for each Lego brick, and we all agreed. The design is about to hit the production lines, and you can already guarantee your hands on one before ordering $35 kits. Remember, 1% of the price will be donated to charity by LEGO CUUSOO as well. Small Fishing: For pre-order, you will need to become a fan of LEGO CUUSOO on Facebook first, although this is a small price to pay for such a great task bring this to the attention of Lego. Lego itself will sell kits sometime this summer if you want to wait for them. See more shots and variations of the Merco world set on the Lego CUUSOO blog. This is what the Museum of London built using Minecraft in a new online exhibition to shed more light on the Great London Fire, which burned huge parts of the capital in 1666. Consisting of three different maps, 'Big Fire 1666' will release the first of its historical creations on July 29. The incredibly detailed project was the product of a collaboration between Adam Clarke (minecraft artist and digital producer), Blockworks (minecraft's professional map building team in the UK) and 'Dragnoz', a YouTube fame in the Minecraft community. The first map of London will show how it looked before the Great Fire, with sound samples scattered throughout its virtual layout explaining some interesting facts about life in the 1600s. The second, which occurs during the height of the fire, will be released in September and will offer plenty of interactive elements. You'll now be able to help citizens escape disaster while making important decisions along the way. The third and final map, which will be re-introduced in February 2017, will enable users to start rebuilding London using the same plans created by architects such as Christopher Wren.
