Manage Add-Ons on internet Explorer's Tools menu.... The Additional Manager is default to show all the currently loaded additions to the Internet Explorer. Each includes: Name-on-name. After this information is relatively new, all additional is not meaningful names. Some, such as acro-e-per-practice, will allow you to determine what adobe acrobat is in this case. Others can only show unique identities as a GUID, or their name globally. Publisher- If available, publisher on additional. Some may include wire (not verified) which indicates that the additional has not been digitally signed on itself. The condition is indicative of whether or not the increase is eligible. Default Display, all currently loaded add-ons, will only show active. Type-ons can use several different interfaces including browser extension, browser wizard objection and ActiveX control in Internet Explorer. File name-it's not always available, but the file name which remains on the increase may be included among other things that help identify the purpose of this increase. Many will be clear based on their name, publisher, or file name. However, if you have an additional one that you do not recognize, or you suspect you have problems, you can disable the additional by selecting it and clicking the inactive radio button. After that depending on the behavior of IE, you can decide if it is additional lysing or not. By changing the show to include additional ons that have been used by Internet Explorer you can see that all the mix, wizard items, and ActiveX controls are known about. You can also use ActiveX as an opportunity to update the control. Learn more about the b-extras... Add Manager opens the Help file in the link below which includes more useful information about the addition, and additional manager. I've got to provide video tips on different topics. See the additional manager of Internet Explorer and see if I walk through the different settings described in this article.
