Castle Rock Entertainment is an American film and television production company founded in 1987[2] by Martin Shafer, director Rob Reiner, Andrew Scheinman, Glenn Padnick and Alan Horn. It is a subsidiary of Warner Bros.[3] a division of WarnerMedia at AT&T. Rob Reiner Company named the company in honor of the fictional city of Tomorrow of the same name, which serves as the setting for several stories by author Stephen King, after the success of his film Stand by Me, based on the novel of King The Body. [4] Reiner and Scheinman already had a production company. They were friends with Shafer, who was working with Horn at 20th Century Fox at the time. Horn was disappointed with Fox and agreed to join the trio in the formation of the company. Horn brought in Padnick, who was a director of Embassy Television. In Castle Rock, Horn became CEO, Shafer led the film division, Padnick ran TV, and Reiner and Scheinman became involved in the production development. [4] The company was initially supported by The Coca-Cola Company, then the parent company of Columbia Pictures. The founders of Coca-Cola and Castle Rock jointly held shares in the company. [5] A few months after the deal, Coca-Cola left the entertainment business and was succeeded by Columbia Pictures Entertainment, Inc. In 1989, Castle Rock was supported by another supporter, Group W, a subsidiary of Westinghouse. [6] Castle Rock later struck a deal with Nelson Entertainment, the company that owned the domestic video rights to Reiner's This Is Spinal Tap Tap, The Sure Thing, and The Princess Bride, to co-finance Castle Rock's films. Under the agreement, Nelson distributed the films on video in North American markets and handled the international theatrical cast, while Columbia, with which Nelson entered into a distribution agreement, would receive domestic theatrical distribution rights. Some of Nelson's holdings were later acquired by New Line Cinema, which took over Nelson's debt. Colombia, shortly after the company's formation, subsequently had to reinvest with a substantial change in terms when the accumulated losses exhausted the initial financing. Reiner stated that Castle Rock's goal was to enable the creative freedom of individuals; a safe haven away from the pressures of studio executives. Castle Rock was making the highest quality movies, whether they made or lost money. [4] Castle Rock also produced several television series, including the sitcom Seinfeld. Turner and WarnerMedia Property In August 1993, Turner Broadcasting System agreed to acquire Castle Rock, along with co-finance partner New Line Cinema. Sale Sale completed on 22 December 1993. [7] [8] The motivation behind the acquisition was to allow a stronger company to handle overheads. [4] By 1994, Castle Rock had launched a foreign sales operation, Castle Rock International, and planned to produce 12-15 films annually. [9] Castle Rock also had aspirations to distribute its own films after its deal with Colombia expired in 1998. [9] Turner Broadcasting later merged with Time Warner in 1996. After a failed attempt to tedify the company, Time Warner integrated Castle Rock Entertainment into Warner Bros. and reduced the production series to five films per year. [10] On June 27, 1997, Castle Rock staff were reduced to 60 employees, and Castle Rock International was converted into Warner Bros.[11] In January 1998, Warner and PolyGram Filmed Entertainment made a deal to co-finance and co-distribute Castle Rock films; this business was taken over by Universal Pictures after the studio's parent company, Seagram, merged with PolyGram later that year. [12] In April 2002, Warner Bros. cut Castle Rock Entertainment's budget following a string of box office bombs. Castle Rock fired 16 of its 46 employees, and Castle Rock's physical production and public relations departments, back-office tasks and the rest were absorbed into Warner Bros.[13] More recently, Rob and Michelle Reiner relaunched the company with a general deal with Warner Bros. Television. [14] Owner of Castle Rock Library Currently, Warner Bros. holds the copyright and general rights to most Castle Rock films and television shows from the pre-1994 and 1993 eras, with a few notable exceptions. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer owns worldwide video rights to most pre-1994 films, by virtue of the acquisition of the PolyGram Filmed Entertainment/Epic library in front of 1996 through Orion Pictures (which included Nelson Entertainment's holdings in part) in 1999.
