After more than 50 years of operation, it closed in May 2002 due to difficult registration and financial issues. Notre Dame's history as a college exclusively for women's education was founded in 1950 due to the Teacher Training Institute, which the Holy Cross Sisters had founded five years earlier. [1] Originally, he occupied two buildings in the well-to-do part of North Manchester. The main building was once a private mansion designed in the Norman style of architecture, while the adjacent building actually served as the carriage house. Although few previous pupils resided in the rooms above the main building, many registered women were discounted to classes from Manchester and its immediate enclosure. In fact, never in all their school history would draw less than half of their students from the commuter distance, and a solid majority of those who attended Notre Dame were first in their families attending college, and came from average to average household. Notre Dame was originally intended as a school to train future teachers, while simultaneously branching into liberal arts and sciences, business and fine arts and later branching into areas such as communications and health sciences. Many additional buildings to campus private homes of different sizes purchased in successful years serve as accommodation halls for a growing number of students of greater distances as well as for offices. However, in the late 1960s, the Holy Cross Hall was built to function as the center of college activity. The three-level building consisted of almost all academic facilities, along with a gym, chapel and dining hall. The original Norman-style mansion became known as Vezo House (named in honor of the president of the long-time college of Janet Vezo's sister, the CSC), and served as the main government building. The carriage house was renovated and expanded to become the Paul Harvey Library, named in honor of a local businessman and philanthropist, and at its peak contained 60,0 volumes and 700 volumes. As well as faculty offices and seminar rooms. The only building built past the Holy Cross Hall from the outset was the Nicholas Issac Student Center, which had a large recreation room as well as student activities and government offices. In later years, the college would buy a former motel located about a mile and a half away to serve as additional dorm space. At the time of the closure, Notre Dame had 22 buildings across North Manchester with a residence hall capacity for about 250 students. Notre Dame, which began in the 1970s, adopted a minor education policy by admitting men to their master's programs, its evening and weekend undergraduate programs, and as non-resident undergraduate students. In 1985, the decision was made to fully educate, and men were accepted as full-time undergraduate students. [1] In contrast to many other all-female colleges that were either both trained or given politics, Notre Dame did not experience any significant negative reaction from either students or graduates, and men were actually warmly welcomed for most of the episode as full-time resident students. The school constantly focused on expanding its undergraduate and postgraduate programs,[2] and at the time of closing, presented a master's degree in art in counseling and scientology (two separate disciplines), a master's degree in education in various fields of teacher education, and a master's degree in science in two fields of health sciences, a physician assistant for studies and in physical therapy. The two recent plans were highly selective, based in a former insurance office building in Manchester city centre about a mile away from the main campus. In November 2001, the school announced that it would close at the end of the school year. [3] The total enrollment of degree candidates in Notre Dame at the time of its closure in 2002 was about 1,100 students, clearly a figure that suggests an institution is not struggling to survive. This leads to speculation among some that the college has made a boiling decision to halt operations, leading others to charge that administrative and financial mismanagement is the cause of the closure in the face of problems with the student matrix. However, it should also be noted that full-time undergraduate enrollment at the school, its primary source of income, was barely more than 400. In addition, tuition at Notre Dame was distinctly lower than most non-governmental colleges in the region, while many continued education and graduate students simply took a few classes without actually receiving a degree, thereby helping matrix numbers be even more unstable. The school premises will also prove to be a liability on which eight hectares of land it occupied were scattered across two miles The area has no room to consolidate or expand among all privately owned houses. At one point from the 1990s, college officials thought of a two-campus scenario, with the second campus to occupy or a pack of land across the River Merrimack in West Manchester or in the same land in South Manchester where the Holy Cross sisters kept their mother's home. A brief taking was also given toward relocating all facilities to the 550-acre (220-acre) campus of the extinct Mount St. Mary's College in the neighboring town of Hooksett, but in the end, none of these plans have ever been concluded. To a certain extent, Notre Dame was also compromised when the University of New Hampshire established a thriving branch campus in Manchester. The latter was strictly a commuter school that offered many of Notre Dame's same degree programs at cheaper costs, resulting in flushing away a significant portion of local area students who would otherwise attend Notre Dame. Finally, with an increasing dependence on local residents to their benefit from their academic offerings, coupled with either disability or unwillingness to attract students from beyond the immediate area, the college had put itself in a large demographic situation. In fact, the creation of highly selective postgraduate programs in physician assistant studies and physical therapy marks a last ditch attempt by Notre Dame to both dig up the academic niche for itself, as well as simply survive. However, the announcement in late summer 2001 that the school would graduate its last class after 52 years existed in May 2002 will come as a shock to many. Those students who have one year or less left on their college programs will be allowed to study at other institutions within New Hampshire College &#amp;#x2013; Collegiate Council in order to obtain Notre Dame degrees, while others were supposed to work individually with them in terms of securing appropriate transfer arrangements to other schools. The outlook for faculty and staff, in stark contrast, would be much more uncomfortable, as little could be done due to helping them secure employment elsewhere. After most of the residence halls were closed, the president's house and even the former library and student center are now owned by private homes. The former Graduate Health Science Building is once again an administrative facility, as is the former motel that served as a residence hall. The two primary buildings on the Notre Dame campus, holy cross hall and Wezzo House, continue to operate in an academic and cultural capacity. Holly Crosshall is currently home to Mount St Mary's Academy, a Catholic preparatory school for grades K to 8, while Veso House is now home to the Manchester Community Music School, a nonprofit music school.
