Unfortunately, given that the 2001 census did not call into question languages, there is no reliable data to confirm exactly how many Bengali speakers currently live in the UK. However, the 2001 census was translated into 24 different languages, including Bengali. In 2003, the Central Information Office was commissioned by the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP) to carry out a review of the ethnic minority languages used by the department. The aim of the review was to assess the communication needs of each community and to recommend languages into which information on the DWP should be translated. Ten key languages were recommended, including Bengali. Even without accurate data on the number of Bengali speakers, it is clear from the above that there is a significant Bengali community in the United Kingdom; translating public service data into Bengali is important for native speakers to be integrated into our society. Translation persons are regularly approached by housing associations and public sector bodies requesting both Bengali translation and Bengali interpreters. Bengali Language – Did You Know This? The Bengali language, also known as Bangla speaks to approximately 230 million people worldwide, most speakers based in Bangladesh or the Indian state of West Bengal. This significant number of speakers makes the Bengali language the 5th most widely used language in the world. Bengali belongs to the family of Indo Aryan languages and comes from Sanskrit. Written from left to right, top to bottom, according to English, at first glance it seems very similar to Hindi. However, some words are actually closely related to Latin as well. For example, the mother is Mater in Latin, Matar in Sanskrit and Mata in Bengali. These interesting similarities are proof of how all languages are internally connected. The Bengali language has proven to be culturally very important to the Bangladeshi people. After the partition in 1947, Bangladesh lost its educated Hindu class; Bangla or Bengali have become a means of identifying their culture and nationalism. When the Pakistani government declared that Urdu would be the only national language, the Bengali language movement fought to recognize Bengali as a national language. The Bengali language movement has contributed to the rise of Bengali literature, and is perhaps partly responsible for the huge number of Bengali speakers who live today.
