If the clause tells you the condition (If you study hard) and the basic clause tells you the result (you will pass your exams). The order of the clauses does not change the meaning. If you study hard, they'll pass their exams. They'll pass their exams if you study hard. Conditional sentences are often divided into different types. Zero conditional We use zero conditional to talk about things that are usually true, especially laws and rules. If I drink a lot of coffee, I can't sleep at night. The ice melts if you heat it up. When the sun goes down, it gets dark. The structure is: if /when + presentation simple >> present simply. First conditionally We use the first conditionally when talking about future situations that we believe are real or possible. If it doesn't rain tomorrow, we'll go to the beach. Arsenal will be at the top of the league if they win. When I get the job done, I'll call you. In the first conditional sentences, the structure is usually: if/when + presentation of simple >> will + infinitive. It is also customary to use this structure with, unless, for so long, immediately or instead of if. I'll leave as soon as the babysitter arrives. I don't want to stay in London unless I get a well-paid job. I'll give you a key in case I'm not home. You can go to the party until you get back by midnight. The second conditional conditional is used to imagine current or future situations that are impossible or unlikely in reality. If we had a garden, we'd have a cat. If I made a lot of money, I'd buy a big house in the country. I wouldn't worry if I were you. The structure is simple: if + past simple >> + would + infinitive. When it is followed by the verb be, it is correct to say if I am, if it was, if it is and if so. However, these structures are often heard with, especially in its form. I wouldn't have mentioned it if I were you. If he were prime minister, he would invest more money in schools. He'd travel more if he was younger. Do this exercise to re-test your grammar.
