Stuart Butler surfed the beaches of south-west France for summer until one day he discovered he was so addicted to water that he couldn't leave it, and continued there. His trips to Lonely Planet and various international surf magazines have taken him all over Indonesia and more, from Yemeni beaches to the coastal jungles of Congo. The results of your travels and photos often appear in international surf media. For a few years he has been writing guides for Lonely Planet from different destinations. Trent Holden, who is based in Geelong, very close to Melbourne, has been working for Lonely Planet since 2005. He contributed to more than 30 guides, from Australia and countries from Asia and Africa. It is attracted to big cities, so it is in its element when it is available to visit the capitals of the countries (while more chaotic, better); he likes to discover interesting bars, art, good street food and underground culture. He also writes guides to idyllic tropical islands in Asia; You're not on safari in African national parks back then. In addition to travelling, he works as a freelance editor and graphic artist and spends everything he has on concerts. His Twitter is @iamtrentholden. Hugh McNaughtan, a former university professor of English, has turned scholarship applications into visa applications, and turned his passion for travel at work. As he wrote restaurants in his native Melbourne, he opened up about the slopes of the Alps and Jura. Nothing makes him happier than being on the road with his two daughters, except maybe he's in a cricket field. He regularly works with Lonely Planet. La an obsession with Adam Skolnick's travels while working as an environmental activist in the mid-1990s. Today he is a renowned journalist and editor who writes about travel, culture, human rights, sport and the environment for Among them The New York Times, Playboy, Outside, BBC.com, Wired, ESPN.com or Men's Health, and has participated in more than 35 Lonely Planet guides. He is passionate about swimming on the high seas and diving and the author of The One Breath: Freediving, Death and the Quest to Shatter Human Limits in Indolirium, which has been hit by crime. He lives in Malibu, California. Instagram: @adamskolnick. Iain Stewart first travelled a lot when he was a student who hitchhiked Europe, then a few short trips to Turkey, Israel and Egypt. Then, in the early 1990s, he spent more than two years travelling around the world, including a season in Tokyo, where he wrote in English. He then decided to study journalism without money or career on his return to the UK, before working as a journalist and gastronomic crime in London. In 1997, he began writing travel guides. Since then he has collaborated with six publishers (including Lonely Planet, Rough Guides and DK Eyewitness) and has signed more than thirty works, with destinations that are different than Ibiza or Cambodia. Among other things, he worked in Lonely Planet Mexico, Indonesia, Croatia, Vietnam, Bali and Lombok and Southeast Asia on Shoestring. He also writes for The Independent, Observer, Daily Telegraph and Wanderlust newspapers and on his Twitter account: @iaintravel. Iain is willing to work wherever there are palm trees, beaches or beer venues. After 18 years, he settled in south London, in 2003 he decided to move a little further south, to Brighton, by the sea, where he still is. A seductive country offering thousands of adventures. Wealth in diversity The fourth most populous country in the world – 255 million and growing – is a towel kaleidoscope that runs 5,000 km above the equator. From the western tip of Sumatra to the eastern tip of Papua, this nation defied homogenization. There are so many cultures, people, animals, customs, plants, landscapes, crafts and meals that look like 100 countries in one. The different villages are very different, as they have come from different continents, and each island is a unique mix of their men, women and children. Over time, rich and deep cultures have evolved, from the mysteries of balinese spirituals to a system of non-western beliefs from the amats of Papua. Beaches and volcanoes The odyssey through Indonesia is to enjoy an impressive landscape as diverse as those who live in it. The wild coast of Sulawesi Island offers white sandy beaches and treasures for divers, and Sumatra is stranded by a legion of nearly 100 volcanoes bordered in the distance, many of which are still active. It's a wonderful show From breathtaking to the views. Here's the sublime: an orangutan that's lazy in a tree. Artwork: a Balinese dancer who works such precise movements that a robot would look like a rag doll. Idyllic: an abandoned strip of white sand, against which the celestial faultbreakers are blished. Which is surprising: Sunday in a crowd at a shopping mall in Jakarta. Interesting: stories too stunning to be fiction, about the history of the wonderful Gang Islands. Fearful: the evil pre-ore of the Komodo dragon. Humble: A woman gathered under the weight of fire in Sumatra. Tasty: restaurant in the South Shocking: A funeral ceremony in Tana Toraja. The Solemn: The Serene Majesty of Borobudur. Great Adventures Sentry Country offers the latest great adventures on Earth. Sit at the door of the train crossing the Yavo, enjoy the passage of time on the ferry to Kalimantan, drive in a cave in Flores, discover the mysterious and ancient village in West Timor, or cross a nature that no one has ever seen before: enjoy exploring the endless diversity of Indonesia's 17,000 islands. Why I like Indonesia's Ryan Ver Berkmoes , an authoriba driving east of the port town of Ende, on the beautiful island of Flores, when, as he took a turn, a breathtaking view of the volcano occupied the entire windshield. It was conical, with lava tongues falling down and a steam spindle, somewhat menacing, coming out of the crater. I said, Day three! And so there is life in Indonesia, where natural beauty is as diverse as the people who find its islands. You can enjoy and have fun in cosmopolitan Bali and get lost the next day on the incredible Gang Islands.
