The ocean and atmosphere are connected. They work together to move heat and fresh water around the world. Circulations driven by wind and ocean current move hot water towards the poles and colder water towards the equator. The ocean can store much more heat than Earth's earth's surfaces. Most of the thermal energy on earth's surface is stored in the ocean. Thus, the absorption and movement of energy on Earth is related to the oceanic-atmosphere system. Links for teachers | Links for Students La Niña is characterized by unusually cold ocean temperatures in the Equatorial Pacific, compared to El Niño, which is characterized by unusually warm ocean temperatures in the same The consequences of El Niño or La Niña require scientists to make short-term climate predictions. To provide the necessary data, NOAA operates a buoy network, which measures the temperature, currents and winds of the equatorial band. These buoys transmit data daily, which are available to researchers and forecasters from all over the world in Students can access this data to carry out the research. Links for teachers | Links for students Temperature differences in the atmosphere are the result of the way solar energy is absorbed as it moves through the atmosphere. The transfer of thermal energy within the atmosphere, hydrosphere and the earth's surface and interior occurs as a result of radiation, convection and conduction. Ocean currents play an important role in transferring this heat to the poles. The main currents, such as the Gulf Stream that flows north, carry enormous amounts of heat to the poles and contribute to the development of many types of weather phenomena. The resources here include seven activities to help students better understand these concepts. Links for teachers | Links for students The heat moves predictably, flowing from warmer to colder objects, until both reach the same temperature. Because water in the ocean has a lot of heat, the ocean has a major effect on the climate. When the air in contact with the ocean is at a temperature other than the sea surface, heat transfer is carried out by conduction. The ocean also absorbs and stores energy from the sun, and when precipitation falls, it releases thermal energy into the atmosphere. The resources in this section include interactive online questionnaires. Contests.
