The new liberal arts sanford ungar pdf

Anh Pham English 101 The New Liberal Arts is an article written by Sanford J. Ungar, who is president of Goucher College in Baltimore, Maryland. At the beginning of his article, Ungar wrote: Difficult economic times inevitably bring the scrutiny of all accepted ideals and institutions, and this time around the liberal arts education has been especially harsh. In other words, Ungar means that recent economic recessions have had a big impact on what people think of going for a liberal arts degree. In his essay, Ungar lists seven misperceptions and how he reacts to them. The most common misperception Ungar identified is that liberal arts grades are no longer affordable. The cost of liberal art education is very expensive, while... show more content... He wrote: The career cart seems to suggest that shortcuts are available to students who lead directly to well-paid jobs, leaving out frills like learning to write and speak well, how to understand the nuances of literacy texts and scientific concepts, how to collaborate with others in research What it means by that is that there are no shortcuts to a well-paid job. It also implies that liberal art education is the only right way to prepare an individual for their future career because it equips those with the skills of formal writing and speaking, and understandings about scientific subject matter or how to cooperate with others for their work, etc. However, I don't think I can deny the fact that the starting salary for a liberal arts graduate is about $32,500 while for an engineer it's $75,000. (. Instantly, what can a person do with his or her philosophy degree right after graduation? You'll probably have to go to more studies before you can find a well-paid job in some big companies or you'll have to fight long before you can open your philosophy store or publish your book. In short, a liberal arts degree will take longer to see its value than vocational education or vocational training. the cost of admissions and the downstream quality of university education. With the questioning of the traditional education system, many offer alternative solutions to combat these misperceptions such as sanford J. Ungar's article, The New Liberal Arts. One of the first issues Ungar focuses on is future jobs that will be available from now until ten or fifty years from now. Ungar believes that the liberal arts are better speculation because they teach understanding of complex and vast topics and how to maintain and develop essential adaptive skills. He also claims that training for a single career can be short-sighted. Ungar is partially correct in its opinion because in this century many works have been replaced by robots and machines. Factories used to be full of many workers who worked manually packing and organizing, but now that we have advanced technology, there's no need for those workers anymore. People need to focus on jobs that won't be replaced by machines and can't be replaced by. Examples of jobs that will not be replaced by machines are social workers, surgeons, therapists, and nutritionists.
