Lotus flower egypt meaning

In ancient Egypt there were two types of lotus - white lotus and blue lotus. The most appreciated was a sweetly scented blue lotus with elegant, pointed buds and cup-shaped flowers. Although due to climate change and reclamation, this flower is found only in the delta today, it was widespread in Ancient Egypt. Lotus flowers were highly appreciated because of their smell and beautiful appearance, and the roots were used as food. In addition, the lotus had symbolic meaning. The flower was a symbol of regeneration and associated with the cycle of the sun - a flower floating on the water and closed at night and re-opened in the morning was considered a reference to the daily appearance of the newly born sun god in a lotus flower floating on the groundwater. Over time, other divine powers, usually those in the form of their child, were painted with Harpocrat, became associated with lotus. In addition, the blue lotus was also associated with the god Nefertem, who embodied the life-giving power of the prime lotus. When this Soul of Re opened in the morning, the light and heavenly smell spread all over the world. The symbolic meaning of the lotus meant that it was also used to decorate dishes; many cups are lotus-shaped, and bowls were often decorated with lotus flowers. As a symbol of revival, the lotus is a fixed part of the decoration of the tomb and coffin, often accompanied by a scarf, which has a similar symbolism.
