Soon after, Willy convinces Colette to write ghosts for him. Colette, in turn, writes a semi-autobiographical novel about a witty and unwitting country girl named Claudine, teasing a bestseller and cultural sensation. After their success, Colette and Willy become the subject of Paris and their adventures inspire additional novels by Claudine. Colette's struggle over creative property and gender roles leads her to overcome social restrictions, revolutionizing literature, fashion and sexual expression. When young countrywoman Sidonie-Gabrielle Maraudine Colette (Keira Knightley) married at 16 and comes to Paris, she becomes overwhelmed. The modern city vibrates. She still feels strange among artists and intellectuals. Her husband, the much older hall lion Henry Willy Gauthier-Villars (Dominic West), introduces her to society. Willy recognizes Colette's literary talent and encourages her to write her own books. At the same time, he blatantly exploits Colette. Novels told from a young woman's first-person perspective become bestsellers. Under the name Willy, Colette managed to give voice to the women of her time, to write openly about the female body and sexuality. But while Willy is drifting with other women, Colette is growing unbridled self-confidence. She refuses to continue publishing under her pseudonym. When she finally goes to the theater and begins to relate to women, the scandal is perfect. Colette — Background The vaudeville writer, journalist and artist Sidonie-Gabrielle Claudine Colette is considered the great lady of French literature of the late nineteenth century. Due to her open-mouthed sexuality and her relationship with Mathilde Missy de Morny - played in the film by Denise Gough - Colette sparked real scandals. The writer's life story forms the backdrop for the biopic of director and screenwriter Wash Westmoreland, who has already delivered an acclaimed biopic with Robin Hood and Still Alice – My Life Without Yesterday the Oscar-winning adaptation of author Lisa Genova's novel. Colette's lead role is played by brit keira knightley twice oscar nominee (The Imitation Game). She just married an older man, Willy (Dominic West), who is a literary entrepreneur. Willy summons his new bride to write about his school days, but on his behalf. It does, and when the book is published, it's an instant success. The main character of the novel is called Claudine, and soon the name appears in products such as soap and perfume. Although Willy admits that the book is based on Gabrielle's school days, he gets all the glory. This begins to annoy Gabrielle, who changed her name to Colette. When people beg for a Claudine sequel, Colette tells Willy that she is not interested. He locks her in a room, telling her to write. Colette resents herself and decides to break free.
