The Duval applause, the lights and the Jacksonville Jaguars were all back in hand in fulfillment, but it was well set that Week 3 at TIAA Bank Field was by my Visit, exchanged in 2019. When I took part in this hot, at the top slip apartment opener, I talked to strangers sitting next to me, sitting, in pedigree heavy for the people, and enjoyed the battery-powered fans who blew in our faces to make known to last future as 100-degree temperatures in the stadium. I always found that you can make an instant emotional connection together once they can easily get strangers not far and wide away from just because you happen to get fans of the related team, but it was in terms of impossible to get that together on Thursday night. You should have screamed to even get your neighbor's attention because everyone was sitting so far. Social replacement markers made recommendations for the distance for fans in pedigree, to adhere to concessions and memorabilia (or the use of the toilet) and position cladding were mandatory. These are the subsidiary realities for N.F.L. fans trying to experience football in the flesh during the coronavirus pandemic. Jaguars fans were blazing to be back home later, considering their team had made a surprising 1-1 start, but there was a cautious song hanging close to the Dolphins. Miami climbed to the top and never agreed to win 31-13, but the fans still stranded it until the fourth quarter stoppage, perhaps enjoying a tiny bit of the normality we all longed for during the pandemic.
