It's a detailed process with dozens of specific rules, expectations and requirements. The insurance company that receives your claim will have years of experience and expertise in how to handle a process. As an accident victim, you will be at a disadvantage. The average victim does not have any experience in dealing with an insurance company. This can lead to insurers taking advantage. The best way to protect your rights in an injury claim is to hire a lawyer. Having legal representation will even be the playground between you and the insurer, suggests that your insurer will not accept a lowball settlement or bad faith tactics. Your attorney can receive contact information with the insurer and the person who adjusts the claim for you, starting with the Letter of Representation. What is the goal of Delegate Mail? Letter of Representation is usually the first form of communication between your personal injury attorney and the insurer responsible for hearing your injury claim. It introduces the adjuster to the insurance claim for your attorney and explains that all communications and letters from that time will be with the attorney rather than the client. It also requires relevant information from the insurer, such as a copy of the insurance policy, for later use by an attorney. The letter represents the purpose of confirming coverage for accidents with insurance companies and explains that the injured party now has legal representation. This is an official letter usually printed on the law firm's letter title paper, complete with the signature of your lawyer. It usually provides attorney's contact information to insurers for use as well. Once your attorney sends a Representative Letter, you won't have to worry about corresponding to someone who adjusts your own claim. You can rest assured your lawyer is handling things for you while you focus on your physical recovery.
